Sunday at 2 p.m., the Boston College Eagles will invade the Mullins Center for a matinee affair with the Minutemen.

The Eagles, 2–0 heading into last night's Hockey East opener against Merrimack, have swept the season series against UMass the last two seasons. However, all three meetings last season were one–goal, sneak–away wins for BC. UMass has not beaten the Eagles since their storied grudge match in the opening round of the 1995 Hockey East tournament.

The Minutemen fell to Tim Lovell's Maine squad in the following round. Now with Lovell on the ice for UMass, Mallen says the team has a new look.

"He's proven himself to be one of the best forwards in Hockey East," Mallen said. "His presence on the ice makes a big difference."

Mallen says UMass can't make any mistakes if they hope to pull off the upsets this weekend. Great position, success on the power play and staying out of the penalty box will go a long way for the Minutemen, he said.

"We could use some good goaltending as well," Mallen said.

Have a happy, sporty, haunted Halloween! remember to play it safe — brush your teeth if you eat candy!

HORRORSCOPES

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — It may be slow going at times today, but it is important to remember that how you get there is just as important as when.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — Set yourself a goal today and be faithful to it; with a little effort you can achieve more than expected. Engage a partner.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — An argument is likely to arise today over what is fair. You will soon realize that it's all a matter of interpretation.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — There is no reason to think that this day will progress in any way other than planned, unless you've been keeping something from yourself.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — Concentration and focus must not be allowed to wax and wane today; events that transpire now will require a good deal of self-discipline.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — Others may wonder what is driving you, but your motives at this time are no one's business but your own. Make sure you know the truth!

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — Details you encounter today will affect how you interpret the overall situation. You may feel as though one piece of the puzzle is misplaced.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — You have been overlooking one or two things lately that may make all the difference between satisfaction and disappointment in the end.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — No one is trying to get in your way, and yet you continue to feel crowded. You may be presenting yourself with self-created obstacles.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You can trust that nature and the stars will play by your rules today, but only for a short time. Take advantage of that which you cannot control.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You may be planning something that is not right for you. Take care that you're pride isn't driving you into something potentially hazardous.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — You may be planning something that is not right for you. Take care that you're pride isn't driving you into something potentially hazardous.

NBA season starts tonight with changes

Jackie Leroux
Around the Horn

All good things must come to an end. That's what we're told. But I don't see why we can't make the good things last as long as possible — keep the good times rolling.

Unfortunately a couple of "Jerrys" out of Chicago just don't see things my way. Bulls owner Jerry Reinsdorf and general manager Jerry Krause seem to be quite bent on breaking up the dynasty that is the Chicago Bulls. They claim that they want to focus on rebuilding, so that they don't end up like the Celtics.

This is the last year of forward Scottie Pippen's contract, and management has made it clear that they have no intention of resigning him. Head coach Phil Jackson is fed up with the powers–that–be in Chicago, and will head for his hideaway in Montana at season's end. Not that management had any intention of inviting him back anyway. Michael Jordan, the glue that holds this team together, says that he will not play without Jackson and Pippen. He has hinted several times that his plans are to retire at the end of the year.

As for the Bulls other superstar, Dennis Rodman, he wasn't even sure he wanted to play until last week. But he decided to put in one more year, "for the fans."

So it's quite evident that the end of this team, a team that has dominated this decade, is on its way. What's a Bulls fan to do? There isn't much to be done, except savor this season, and ponder what the end will mean. It's hard now to imagine a season without Chicago riding atop the standings, without Scottie, Mike, Dennis and Phil kicking butt all winter long and then well into June.

Jordan will be missed the most, that goes without saying. He is without a doubt the best thing basketball has ever and possibly will ever see. There will be a definite hole when he is gone, and none of the current players out there today will be able to fill it. Not Grant Hill, not Penny Hardaway, not Allen Iverson (and definitely not Shaquille "show me the money" O'Neal). There are players out there with a lot of talent, but no one quite matches up to His Airness. He will forever be the ruler other players are measured against.

Now even this season's team is becoming questionable. The Bulls open this final season in Boston tonight, and they're doing so with some sore feet. Pippen will be missing two to three months while recovering from foot surgery. Jordan is just getting over having several ingrown toenails removed (yuck!) and small forward Toni Kukoc has a foot injury, thanks to which he put in no practice this summer (and his 25 percent preseason field goal percentage shows it).

The Bulls are not the only ones suffering from injuries. Shaq will miss opening night due to a pulled abdominal muscle. His Lakers will face Utah tonight, who are without assist and steal king John Stockton, due to injuries. Keith Van Horn, John Calipari's highly touted rookie, is out with a sprained ankle.

On top of all this, Charles Barkley is threatening, once again, to retire. He is angry with the NBA for not supporting him in his latest legal troubles. How could he possibly expect David Stern to tell the media that the NBA stands behind him for throwing some poor schmuck out of a window in a bar in Orlando?

New reports have come out that there is rampant marijuana smoking and heavy drinking around the league. As much as 60–70 percent of the players supposedly participate in these activities. This is supposed to be news to us? Surely we are not expected to believe that the NBA players are saints (except Grant Hill of course). The drug testing standards in the league have not changed since 1985. With these new reports coming out, the standards will probably be changed. Makes you wonder how many players will be "retiring" with Jordan.

Also new this year: women referees Dee Kantier and Violet Palmer have joined the squad of referees in the NBA this year. It's about time, too. You go girls! Of course, Rodman has already found himself in trouble, after slapping one of the new refs on the rear end. He claims he was just treating them like he treats any other man. Yeah, right. If I remember correctly, Dennis avoids referees at all costs. Either that or he headbutts them.

So as the basketball season gets under way tonight, one thing is clear. The NBA is on the verge of a new era. Things are changing left and right. For old school fans like me, there isn't much we can do. Except sit back, and enjoy every moment of this season.

Senior center Tim Lovell will need a big performance if the Minutemen are to knock off No. 2 BU.

Weekend no treat for UM

By Corey Peter Goodman
Collegian Staff

As soon as daylight fades to gray this evening, millions of kiddies around the country will take to the streets in their festive garb, dodging vampires and ghouls alike, and assuming a new identity if only for a few hours. After all, it's Halloween.

The Massachusetts hockey team is no different. Tonight, the Minutemen will be their disguise as they try to pose as giant killers in the most feared college hockey spectrum in the country, Hockey East.

The evil monster they'll face is the No. 2 Boston University Terriers, who'll welcome the Minutemen into their lair, better known as Walter Brown Arena, for a 7 p.m. showdown.

UMass coach Joe Mallen knows it'll take more than a stake through the heart to dispose of the Minutemen's biggest foe.

"There are no easy games in Hockey East," Mallen said. "Even though it's BU, we have to take this like any other game and play good hockey."

The Terriers (2–0) have been the class of Hockey East since UMass was reinstated three years ago. In 1994, the Terriers reeled off their last 10 games, including their tournament run, en route to a national title game victory over Maine. BU fell just short of repeats the past two seasons, falling to Michigan in the semifinals in 1995 and North Dakota in the title series last year.

Coach Jack Parker's troops swept through the Hockey East tournament two of the three seasons, which included a run of nine straight decisions against UMass. However Mallen says when the two teams take the ice tomorrow evening, the slates will be wiped clean.

"There's no doubt in my mind that the bottom team in Hockey East can beat the top team on any given night," Mallen said. "That's how good this conference is."

This year, BU looks stronger than ever as they

Minutewomen take on Georgia, Clemson in weekend tourney

By Kathleen Ralls
Collegian Staff

Ray Charles once sang a little tune about Georgia always being on his mind.

The Massachusetts women's soccer team could not disagree more, unless you are goalie Danielle Dion — who hails from Atlanta.

With a season filled with injuries to key players, sickness, and a constant reconstruction of the team's strategy, their motto could read "Take it one day at a time."

UMass heads this weekend to Athens, Ga. to compete in the University of Georgia Tournament where they will play Clemson today and the host team, Georgia, on Sunday. The 15–2 Minutewomen will have to do it with their centerhalf, Robin Smith, playing at half speed since recovering from injuries.

"We'll be splicing it together and we'll play hard and do the best we can," coach Jim Rudy said. "This will be the hardest weekend for us in a long time."

On Friday, UMass and No. 17 Clemson (11–5) will clash at 1 p.m. The Tigers have outscored their opponents 35–17, in an extremely difficult schedule which includes seven nationally ranked teams. Clemson has been ranked as high as No. 10 in the nation this season and are flying high off a huge upset victory against Virginia.

Massachusetts defensive squad has their work cut out for them, with Clemson's leading scorers sophomore Jenny Crawford (13 goals, one assist, 27 points) followed by junior Sara Burkett (6g, 11a, 23pts) and junior Sheri Beuter with (3g, 7a, 13pts).

"They have one of the best threesomes up front in the nation," Rudy said. "They are very mobile, and very good."

The goaltending duties have been split between Suzanne Putnam and Meredith McCullen, who have combined for a goals against average of 1.05.

Women's Soccer

Today and Sunday

Sunday's match could also pose multiple threats for the Minutewomen as they face the Bulldogs of Georgia and their feisty home crowd. Rudy's ex–assistant coach, Bill Barker, who, according to Rudy has a good clue on how UMass plays, is currently an assistant for Georgia.

The Bulldogs stand at 12–4–1, and qualified for the Southeastern Conference tournament with a 5–3 record after two big conference wins this weekend.

"Georgia will be one of the fastest teams we play this year," Rudy said. "And they have one of the nation's leading goal scorers in Stephanie Yarem (16g, 1a, 33pts) who is rated as one of the best in the air in the nation."

Accompanying Yarem is Allison Thornbury with 6 goals and 7 assists for 19 points and Bentley Bickerstaff with 5 goals and 3 assists for 13 points to head up the Bulldogs offense.

"There should be 1,700–1,500 fans there, and they are a very tough crowd to play in front of," Rudy said, "This is a big, big weekend for us."

UMass to battle Hofstra

Team expects passing attack

By Luke Meredith

If there was ever a time a time for the Massachusetts football team to respond to adversity, it would be Saturday.

Consider the obstacles facing the Minutemen entering tomorrow's

Football
Massachusetts vs. Hofstra
Saturday, 12:30 p.m.

12:30 p.m. date with the Hofstra Flying Dutchmen at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

UMass is 2–6 (1–5 Atlantic 10). Independent Hofstra is 6– 2, with wins over New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Lehigh and Buffalo in the last four weeks; UMass is coming off its worst home loss in 10 years; Hofstra is 3–1 on the road, including a 33–14 win at UNH.

The Minutemen need to win their last three games to avoid their worst record in head coach Mike Hodges' six– year tenure. If Hofstra sweeps its last three, the Dutchmen will be thinking about the NCAA Division 1–AA playoffs.

Throw in the fact that the Minutemen — who sport the second worst pass defense in the A–10 — will be facing a Hofstra squad that averages 329 passing yards per game without the services of starting defensive backs Tehran Hunter and Jerard White, and it would appear that there is cause for concern in the UMass camp.

But Hodges is 9–1 against non–conference opponents, and 6–0 in the last three years. Add in the fact that UMass has averaged 44.5 points in their last three games against non–conference teams at McGuirk, and the outlook isn't as dreary as it seems.

Nonetheless, Hodges is concerned about the Flying Dutchmen's high flying run–and–shoot offense, which has racked up 143 points during October, a month that has seen them go 4–0.

"The biggest problem Hofstra poses for us is they throw the football [a lot]. They're a run–and–shoot football team, and we've really struggled against teams that throw the football," Hodges said.

UMass has allowed 403 yards passing to Villanova, 459 to Buffalo and 350 to Delaware in the last three weeks.

Hodges sees Hofstra's attack as similar to Buffalo, and is hoping for the same result on Saturday.

"If we can force them to not run the ball, force them to throw the ball on every play, then we'll have an

1997 UMass HOCKEY PREVIEW

Thursday, October 30, 1997 | The Massachusetts Daily Collegian | Sports Extra

The '97-'98 hockey season is here, and so is Lovell

The senior co-captain will bring mix of offensive skill and defensive toughness to UM

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

Since the program's reinstatement in 1993, the Massachusetts hockey team has been in a lot of different situations during its young Hockey East conference tenure — big wins, disheartening losses, record-setting performances, etc.

Yet, a few things do not come to mind when reflecting on UMass hockey — a 50-point scorer, an All-HE selection, a possible HE Player of the Year, and to top them all, a Hobey Baker Award finalist.

Well, you can start thinking about those things, because Tim Lovell is in town.

The senior co-captain and forward for the Minutemen has finally suited up in Maroon and White and is ready to help the team take the next step towards conference and national recognition.

Due to NCAA regulations, the high-flying forward sat out last season after transferring from the University of Maine, so he could spend an entire year with his new team rather than half a season.

Lovell brings an impressive resumé from the Black Bears to UMass this season including an outstanding 21 career power play goals at Maine, a preseason and regular season All-HE selection in 1995-96, and a 1995 NCAA East Regional MVP award.

The wait for Lovell has been the hardest part, and now it is over. In Sunday afternoon's home opener against Boston College in the William D. Mullins Center (2 p.m.), the Pioneer Valley will witness what Lovell can bring to the ice.

"I've been to the final game, and that should say enough," Lovell said. "To be in that situation, and to be a big part of that team at Maine, I think that people listen to that, and I can bring that knowledge here.

"When I played at Maine, we had guys like [Anaheim Mighty Ducks'] Paul Kariya and [Olympic team member] Chris Imes around, and I've always listened to the guys who've been a step further. Experience is big, and you always listen to the people who have the most experience."

Thanks, coach

For both of Lovell's past and present coaches, the intangibles he brings to the ice create a tangible effect on the team, and UMass coach Joe Mallen does not regret the year layoff for Lovell's insertion into the lineup. The heart and determination his senior co-captain has brought into team practices has instantly replaced the work ethic of one of last year's co-captains, Rob Bonneau.

Tim Lovell File

- 1995 NCAA East Regional MVP
- 3 year member of top 5 Maine team

"Number one, he provides a very hard work ethic in practice, which is very important to all of our guys," Mallen said. "For a smaller guy, he has a lot of heart, and he's the kind of guy who is going to hit you before you hit him. That's something great to show our players in terms of his particular fortitude and courage.

"On the flip side, he does things on the ice that I've never seen from a guy in 20 years of coaching. During the course of a penalty kill or power play, he can direct traffic while a play is going on. He has the ability to do that."

Lovell was a major part of Maine coach Shawn Walsh's squad from 1993-96, a team that was perennially in the top five of the country. His 108 points in 115 games played (51 goals, 57 assists) for the Black Bears is characteristic of the all-around play Lovell can bring to a team. Walsh feels that kind of play can help UMass make the jump into HE's top four teams.

"One of those teams in that bottom half is going to make a move into the top four," Walsh said. "UMass certainly has that capability. It'll be interesting to see who emerges, and they are possibly one of them.

"Tim [Lovell] will bring them an offensive creativity they have never had in a specific player. I'm curious to see how a year layoff will effect his game, but he's a great kid to have on your team, and I hope it really works out well for him."

One of the more surprising statements on Lovell this preseason was from a fellow upperclassman, senior defenseman Tom O'Connor. The Springfield native has been a steady defensive presence for the Minutemen the past four seasons, and when it comes to a team style of defense, he notes the coaching of Walsh has rubbed off on his former forward in more ways than one.

For O'Connor, Lovell has supplied more than just offense for the team, but also a defensive philosophy that has been the trademark for the Black Bears — team first.

"I think that Tim Lovell has brought a lot of those ideas with him from Maine, and they're always unbelievable at team defense," O'Connor said.

THANG VO / COLLEGIAN

For the Pioneer Valley, Tim Lovell has only been seen in practice, but this Sunday, he and his UMass teammates will be seen in their home opener against Boston College this Sunday at 2 p.m.

A case of transfer-itis

Those questions concerning his year layoff might have been answered with his one goal, two assist performance against Dalhousie in a 7-0 exhibition win on Oct. 19 at the Mullins Center, and his four-point performance (1g, 3a) in the season opening 6-4 loss against Lowell. But exhibition games are exactly that — exhibitions — but his fast start in the Lowell game is exemplary of the grind of HE competition.

Tim Lovell File

- 108 points in 115 games played for Maine
- All-Hockey East selection in 1995

For Lovell, the year layoff after his transfer was both beneficial and frustrating. It does not matter what sport you play, if you make it to this level of competition, that inner competitive spirit has to burn bright inside of you — and that spirit is the key to Lovell's game. At 5-foot-10, Lovell has the size needed to go up against the towers that frequent collegiate and professional hockey.

The wait gave Lovell a chance to gel with the team, but you know what happens when something sits too long on the shelf? A moldy sort of sensation can develop, and the Minutemen's top forward wants to go forward with the season.

"The full year is more beneficial because I'll play 20 more games this year," Lovell said. "The team really didn't start off well last year, so this year I'll have more of an impact right from the start.

"[The sitting] bothered me, because I knew every day I wasn't going to play. You still have to work hard every day, but it can get to you. I'm itching to go now, and I'm trying to get in game shape."

The top of the heap

The catalyst for any student-athlete is to make it to the NCAA Championship game — period. All of the hard work, all of the commitment comes forth when a student-athlete takes to the field, the court or in this case the ice, to take on the top of the heap for the ultimate prize.

Coming off one of the most exciting games in NCAA history, a 4-3 triple overtime win over Michigan in the NCAA semifinals, Lovell took the ice with his Maine teammates on April 1, 1995 to face their historical HE foe Boston University in the National Championship game. In front of a capacity Providence Civic Center crowd of 12,155, the Terriers took a bite out of the Black Bears with a 6-2 win, heralding BU coach Jack Parker's second NCAA Championship.

To say the least, it was a disappointing loss; especially to a team like the Terriers, who perennially hold the distinction as the squad every team in the country wants to hang a big "L" on. That kind of experience fuels the fire for Lovell to try to bring UMass to the level where it can finally beat a team like BU — and literally hang that "L" on a team which felt the need to score 14 goals on the Minutemen in the HE quarterfinals in 1996.

In the end, if Lovell can help bring UMass to the next level of competition, then a year of waiting for him — or even five years of waiting in HE — will be all worth it.

"[Being in the championship game]

The rock of the Minuteman defense

Brad Norton, the 6-6 senior co-captain, leads the team in his fourth and final year

By Corey Peter Goodman
Collegian Staff

While training with a professional team in Finland last summer, Brad Norton's chin was sliced open by an opposing team member's skate blade. The two-inch gash left a puddle of blood on the ice and an equally long scar on the chin of the Massachusetts hockey team's top defenseman.

So, Norton cleaned his face, took 30 stitches and returned to the game only minutes later.

"It didn't hurt," Norton said. "That kind of stuff happens in hockey. You just have to get back in there."

This example of unmatched levels of focus, determination and toughness is what Norton has represented since arriving in Amherst three years ago. The senior co-captain has remained the rock in the Minutemen's defense ever since.

However, the road has not been so pleasant for Norton. Coming from a highly competitive and talented Cushing Academy squad in high school, he joined a UMass group in 1994 trying to survive its first season in perhaps the best college hockey conference in the country, Hockey East.

"It was tough, coming in here winning just six games," Norton said. "The teams we were playing were great. It was a reality-check for me."

But perseverance has paid off for the 6-foot-6 senior, who can now take partial credit for helping UMass leap over its obstacles and succeed in the conference.

Norton says he had plenty of help in the process.

"Guys like Warren [Norris] and Rob [Bonneau] really made this team who they are," he said. "They were great leaders. We'll miss them this year."

Now heading into his final campaign at UMass, Norton has his sights set on leading the Minutemen to bigger and better things. Despite making considerable strides in each of its first three seasons in HE, UMass was picked to finish second-to-last in the HE pre-season poll earlier this month.

Yet Norton isn't the least bit surprised.

"We haven't proven anything yet," Norton said. "People may not like it, but until we finish at the top of the pack in the conference, we probably won't get the respect we deserve."

While the fans see the poll results as a direct insult to the program, Norton said the players are using it as a rallying cry this season.

"We've had our recruiting. We've got the talent. We're due," Norton said. "This year, it'll all pay off. I think we're going to surprise people."

Norton says his job this year is made a lot easier with the presence of Maine transfer Tim Lovell in the lineup. Named the MVP of the 1995 NCAA East Regional Tournament, the senior centerman provides the experience and the offensive firepower that'll keep the puck in the offensive zone and the opposing teams back on their heels.

"He was a leader for us last year and he didn't even play," Norton said. "With the NCAAs, the Final Four, he has all the experience."

"He keeps the spirits high, but he's not afraid to bark at you. He demands a lot of respect, but trust me, he gets it. He's like a player-coach for us out there."

With a talented group of goaltenders behind him in senior Brian Regan, freshman Finnish-import Markus Helanen and sophomore Dan DiLeo, Norton says the Minutemen will be stingy with the goals.

"Regan looks better than ever," Norton said. "And, Markus is getting better everyday. Regan deserves the job, but people will be pushing him all season. All three are great... thank God."

Norton sees himself as the glue that holds everyone together. As the largest guy on the ice for UMass, it's no secret that he's also assumed the role as the bully.

"I love it, that's my game," Norton said. "I'm not going to put up a lot of numbers, except in penalty minutes.

is unbelievable," Lovell said. "You work so hard during the year, and once you get to the NCAAs, there's no bigger feeling than to have every team in the nation all in one spot.

"When it comes down to listening on how to get to the top, I was part of team that was in the top five for three years in a row. I think the young guys are listening to that, and anyway I can help the team out is a bonus."

The highest praise for Lovell comes from his partner in crime, senior defenseman and co–captain Brad Norton. Lovell is the more vocal, and Norton is the more physical, sides to the captaincy, and the two seniors are the proverbial yin and yang of the Minutemen's fate this season.

The big man from Acton, and Cushing Academy, knows what his cohort brings to the ice, and Gabriel come down and blow your horn, because the Mullins Center goal judge might be busy this season.

"[Tim's impact on the team is] big time," Norton said. "Just last year he had an impact, and he didn't even play. Just look at the NCAAs, the Final Four, he has all the experience, and he keeps our spirits high, but he's not afraid to bark at you.

"He demands a lot of respect, and trust me, he gets it. He's like a player–coach for us out there."

Amherst has ensued for Helanen, but not one extremely foreign to the native of Vantaa, Finland.

The Minutemen's first recruit ever from across the pond has spent his share of time in the U.S., first learning about UMass while surfing the Web when he stayed a year in the States in 1993–94, attending New Hartford High School in N.Y. After his stay in the U.S., Helanen did his required one–year residence in the armed services, and has brought that hardened work ethic to the Minutemen.

His road has brought him from the sticks of the Land of a Thousand Lakes to the sticks of the Land of the Free, and the Home of the Brave — or less patriotically, western Mass.

It was a stroke of luck that Helanen even got in touch with the coaching staff, as their attentions were centered on other players from Finland, and Mallen can only thank his lucky stars for his future goaltending star in waiting.

"He had written to us, and luckily, we followed it up," Mallen said. "He has great size, great tools in terms of handling the puck and playing his position. His work ethic is impeccable, spending almost all of last year in the Finnish army. He has great deal of maturity about him, and I think he's going to be a great goalie in this league."

For Helanen himself, the perfect situation would have been if his old teammate Tuomo Jaaskelainen could have made the trip to Amherst, too. Jaaskelainen now dons the colors of Maine, but the two teamed up to make their dream of playing hockey in America a reality, and now they will face each other on the ice — come Feb. 14 in Orono, Maine.

"Me and my friend wanted to come to a Division I university in America, no matter where," Helanen said. "He got a chance to go to Maine, and it would have been perfect if he came here with me, but it's been my dream to play college hockey here in America. It was lucky for us to get a chance to come and play here."

Regan has benefited from the competition Helanen has given him this fall, but the time for the Finnish netminder is still slightly down the road. This year is Regan's time to shine, and he has no doubt that when he leaves, the torch will be passed into more than capable hands — whether that goalie is Helanen, or Dileo.

"Marcus is a very good goaltender, and given some time, he'll be a very good goalie in Hockey East," Regan said. "I think we've pushed each other, and we've learned from each other. They play a different style of goaltending over there across the water, and its been a competitive training camp.

"We're friends off the ice, and Marcus is as funny as can be. After I leave, goaltending at this school will be fine. No doubt about it."

UMass TV and Radio Schedule

Seven home games are scheduled to be televised, and will be broadcasted on Media One this season:

Nov. 2	Boston College	2 p.m.
Nov. 21	Providence	7 p.m.
Dec. 6	Northeastern	8 p.m.
Jan. 23	Boston College	7 p.m.
Feb. 8	UMass–Lowell	2 p.m.
Feb. 21	New Hampshire	7 p.m.
Mar. 7	Maine	7 p.m.

Every game can be heard on the UMass Sports Radio Network, on the network's flagship station, WHMP 1400 AM. Ted Baker will be the play–by–play man, with Brock Hines on color commentary. Also, broadcasting selected games will be WHAI 98.3 FM (Greenfield), WBRK 1340 AM (Pittsfield), WADN 1120 AM (Concord), and WATD 95.9 FM (Marshfield).

Additionally, selected games will be broadcast on WMUA 91.1 FM, the UMass student radio station:

Insane in the membrane; UM hockey in the brain

Leigh Torbin

Come on sports trivia junkies, who won the 1980 women's Boston Marathon? Don't know, do you? But, you probably recall Rosie Ruiz taking the Green Line through Newton, jumping through some spectators and apparently winning the race — until her rouse was discovered.

Sometimes the memory that endures years later isn't the winner, but something special that happens on the way, and that goes hand in hand with Massachusetts hockey. Call it the Tin Cup effect, after the movie where Kevin Costner's character loses the U.S. Open, but nails a legendary drive to get a 12 on the 18th hole.

We remember Ruiz and Costner, but overlook what ever pro won that fictional open, or the immortal Jackie Gareau, who won at Boston in 1980. If you did know Garcau, you really need to get a girlfriend by the way.

Maybe, you'll find one at Time Out...

- There are people who play hockey, and then there are hockey players. Sal Manganaro was a hockey player in every sense of the phrase, and that includes having a short fuse on occasion. I can still close my eyes and see him getting ejected at New Hampshire two years ago.

Whoever the referee was that night gave Sal the old heave–ho for something marginal, and he exchanged some pleasantries with the rabid UNH fans as he left. Mind you, UNH fans, through blue and white face paint, taunted the team managers prior to a game last year, calling them "the worst damn stick boys I've ever seen."

The tunnel points directly towards the visiting media end of the press box and offered a perfect view of Sal later, out of view to all but us, throwing his stick down the expansive tunnel like a boomerang — shattering against the back wall. It was a thing of beauty floating through the air, and a perfect snapshot of the intense leader that Sal was.

Don't ask me who won that game. I think UNH did and could look it up and check, but it doesn't matter. I don't recall who scored, how they scored, or who was in net. It's the Tin Cup effect at work.

I do, however recall one other thing about that night and it involves one UMass staffer's rave review of the Whittemore Center's restroom facilities.

"Have you been to the pisser...wow!!!!!," was all he could say, rejuvenating his spirits just seven days removed from Hurricane Fatpig up in Orono, and the blaring fire alarm.

The Minutemen have not been the cream of the Hockey East crop the past three seasons. Through some of the longest nights, I've found myself taking pleasure in the small, mundane, often unnoticed, moments. These things mean UMass Hockey to me, and will remain far longer than mere wins and losses.

- It's the way Tiger Holland would never get into the team huddle before the start of a period, but hang about 10 feet back from the pack.
- It's in the first few chords of UMass' intro song, "Black Betty," no matter how sick of it you got by the end of the year.
- It's the endless debates with the guy who sits next to me during games, who actually thinks the dancing puck they put up on the scoreboard is a dancing M&M.
- It's the great doughnuts in BU's press box, and WHMP's Brock Hines calling me "Koharski."
- It's NESN's Bob Norton having to stand on a crate to interview Brad Norton between periods last year at UNH.
- I remember one night right before the teams came back out onto the ice the Minuteman mascot had skated (pardon me, stumbled) too close to the UMass tunnel and Tiger Holland absolutely leveled him.

I think it was the hardest hit of his career.

All I can remember, other than the roaring laughter, was some 11–year old kid named Stan, with a huge head jumping up and yelling, "They killed the Minuteman!"

"You bastard!!!!"

No, I was the bastard for once when I left the gas cap from the S.S. Jorma at a Mobil station in Manchester, N.H. I say for once because it's usually ever–present UMass hockey superfan Mark Lestuk, who often has no shame.

Last year at Northeastern, already well lit from celebrating the hoop win earlier in the day over BC at McGann's in the North End, Mark, the Pride of Section T behind the opposing bench, made his presence known. His favorite referee, Steve McBride, was in the house and prepared to drop the

At my size, if you can't push people around you're not going to be around long."

Norton's fellow senior co–captain, Lovell, says he is the brains, and Norton is the brawn of the team's operations.

"I'm more vocal than Brad is, and he's more of the intimidator," Lovell said. "We have a good mixture, and guys are going to listen to Brad because he's a big kid, and they'll listen to me because of the respect they've given me.

"It works out well, both ways, with one captain on defense and one with the forwards."

Together, Norton says this year's team is the most talented one he's played on. Unlike previous Minuteman editions, he added, this year's team is more prepared, completely dedicated and expects to win each and every night.

"We're tight this year also," Norton said. "We weren't real close last year. We have more guys now who will do whatever it takes to win and sacrifice their body for their teammates."

Norton says that if winning for themselves isn't enough motivation, then winning for head coach Joe Mallen is.

"This guy has been so patient the last four years," Norton said. "I would have gone nuts. He's done the recruiting and the coaching. The guys really enjoy playing for him and it shows. If anyone deserves to win, it's the coach."

Mallen is depending on Norton to carry the load and anchor a experienced defense, and a sizeable defense as well that averages 6–3 in height.

"I like big defensemen," Mallen said. "But it's not just about being big, they need to be just as talented. Big defensemen can neutralize forwards in a small rink game. But in a big rink, they need to be able to move and handle the puck well if we're going to win."

If anyone on the team does, Norton certainly fits that mold.

Mullins Center Mauler...

Brad Norton has wreaked havoc on opponents at the Mullins Center, and will again this Sunday in UMass' home opener against Boston College at 2p.m.

The No. 2 line will be No. 1 UMass priority

By Jorma Kansanen

You always read about No. 1, but how about No. 2?

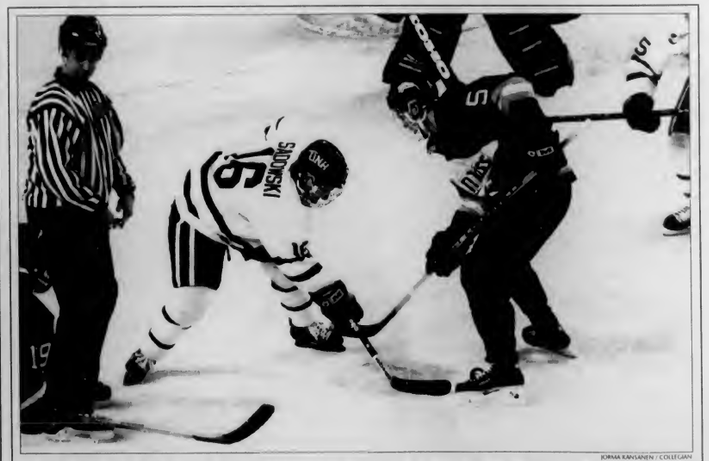
The No. 1 line of senior co–captain Tim Lovell, junior Steve MacKinnon and sophomore Jeff Blanchard will get all the immediate attention for the Massachusetts hockey team, but the role of the No. 2 line will be important — if not more important — to the team this season.

The duo of seniors Dan Juden and Chris Fawcett will anchor the No. 2 line for the Minutemen this season, with freshman Nick Stephens finding left wing duties in the season opener against Lowell. Stephens is coming off a successful stint with St. Paul of the United States Hockey League, where he scored 20 points for the Vulcans.

UMass coach Joe Mallen knows he will get a lot of quality ice time from his No. 1 line this season, but the key to the Minutemen's success will be the impact his No. 2 line can make on the ice. If the senior duo can not get on a roll at the start of the season, as they were a non factor in the 6–4 loss to Lowell last Friday night, Hockey East opponents will key in on Lovell, MacKinnon and Blanchard — and the UMass offense could come to a screeching halt.

"When you talk about Dan Juden and Chris Fawcett, you are not going to lead them before a Tim Lovell, a Brad Norton or a Brian Regan," Mallen said. "But those two guys are two important cogs in the wheel for us this season, and both of them have the ability to score.

"Chris has been a great penalty killer for us, and both of them played on our No. 2 power play unit last season, and were successful."



Juden came out with a fast start last season, and in the first eight games, he was right behind the scoring leaders, then–seniors Rob Bonneau and Warren Norris, with 7 points (3 goals, 4 assists). After a rough offensive start for the team at the start of the season, Mallen switched around his lines, moving Juden and fellow junior Chris Fawcett up to the No. 1 line with then–senior Tom Perry.

UMass came out with a key 6–5 win over Merrimack, ending positively an eight–game HE slate to open the season.

However, while Fawcett went on to record 22 points (13 goals, 9 assists), good for fourth best on the team, Juden fell off the scoring pace, and only recorded 8 more points the rest of the season (6g, 9a).

Mallen wants that kind of early effect Juden had on his team to last the entire season this year.

"We have to get some more scoring out of [Juden and Fawcett] to be more successful," Mallen said. "I think we'll get some good scoring out of MacKinnon, Blanchard and Lovell, but really, its the play of those guys that can really make or break us this year."

JORMA KANSANEN / COLLEGIAN

Senior Dan Juden will be relied upon to help shoulder the scoring burden for UMass this season as he will center the No. 2 line for the Minutemen.

Mallen is given a vote of confidence from his players and UM

By Corey Peter Goodman
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts hockey coach Joe Mallen has never been the kind of guy to turn down a challenge.

After graduating from Michigan State in 1977, Mallen took over the coaching duties at UMass–Boston where he led the Beacons from club level status to a thriving Division II program.

Mallen then accepted an assistant coaching position at U.S. International University before Boston College came calling in 1985. As an assistant coach in Chestnut Hill, where he was in charge of recruiting former BC standouts like goaltender Greg Taylor, Mallen played a huge part in the Eagles' national title run in 1990.

But in 1993, Mallen accepted the greatest challenge of them all when he took over the reigns of UMass' newly reinstated hockey program. Even more so of a challenge was that the program was preparing to plunge into college hockey's top conference — Hockey East.

"I'm a competitor," Mallen said. "I always have been."

Now entering his fifth season at UMass, and the fourth in Hockey East, Mallen is close to his initial goal: bringing the level of UMass hockey to the advanced HE plateau.

Under Mallen's tutelage, the Minutemen went 20–9 in 1993, while playing an independent schedule. In their first Hockey East campaign in 1994, the Minutemen struggled, going 6–28. But in 1995, UMass recorded 10 wins followed by its 12 victories last season.

"I'm happy where we are," Mallen said. "We've consistently improved each year, and I don't see that changing."

Mallen said that the Hockey East preseason poll, which predicts UMass to finish second–to–last in the conference in front of Northeastern, has not recognized the team's improvements.

"It's alright. The proof will be on the ice," Mallen said. "We know we're at the second phase of the rebuilding process now. It's time to start playing to our potential."

The hard work Mallen has put into the program may not be noticed in the preseason poll, but it is noticed by coaches like New Hampshire's Dick Umile. After two close games last season at the Mullins Center, with the Wildcats only pulling out one–goal wins over the Minutemen, Umile knows firsthand what UMass can bring to the table.

"What Joe and his coaching staff have done in only four years is build the program up from a lower half team to one that can possibly break into the top four teams this season," Umile said. "They've closed the gap from being an easy 'W' to giving teams like ours a run for our money."

According to Mallen, the team has an enormous amount of ability to build on this season. Leading the team are the three senior defensemen, co–captain Brad Norton, Toni O'Connor and Mike Gaffney.

"They're the strength of the team," Mallen said. "Those guys will show our freshmen what it takes to win at this level."

Leading the offensive attack for Mallen's squad is senior Maine–transfer Tim Lovell. A three–year starter for the Black Bears, Lovell brings the Minutemen lightning–quick speed, great puck–handling, a proven goal scorer and most importantly, three years experience in the conference.

Lovell also provides the big name that's expected to lure bigger and better recruits to UMass in the coming years. However, Mallen says UMass' recruits are starting to blossom now, and with the senior leadership guiding them, he sees a competitive fire building within his team.

"Tim [Lovell] has really impressed us," Mallen said. "He knows the teams in this league well, and he can show the younger players the kind of work ethic they'll need."

Mallen said that junior forward Steve MacKinnon — the Minutemen's top returning scorer — is one of the guys this year who will emerge as a team leader.

"He's really improved his play and we're excited about him," Mallen said.

MacKinnon lived up to his coach expectations with an outstanding performance in the season opener last Friday against UMass–Lowell. Teaming up with Lovell and sophomore Jeff Blanchard on the No. 1 line, MacKinnon ended up with two goals and an assist on the evening.

There's no doubt that Mallen is the main reason for UMass' steady improvement and promising outlook since its reinstatement.

Norton believes the players push themselves harder because of the respect they have for Mallen.

"He's a great coach and he works hard," Norton said. "The guys really enjoy playing for him and it shows."

The University believes in Mallen as well. Last year, Mallen was rewarded with a three–year contract extension, which includes an increase in his base salary and incentives for NCAA appearances, and begins when his current contract expires at the end of this season.

Now that's a vote of confidence.

Experienced senior defensive unit will key Minuteman success this season

Gaffney and O'Connor round out first senior class to play for four years in a grueling Hockey East

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

If you watch the game of hockey at all, you know what players like Wayne Gretzky do — score points.

Even if you are one of the few, the proud, the collegiate hockey fan, you will recognize names like Massachusetts' own Tim Lovell, Boston University's Chris Drury or even former Michigan Wolverine Brendan Morrison — because those kind of players are usually seen on the highlight reels.

Yet, defense is the key to success, and this season Massachusetts has a solid nucleus to build on.

Along with senior defenseman and co–captain Brad Norton, fellow classmates Mike Gaffney and Tom O'Connor and sophomore Dean Stork return to the experienced UMass backline this season, and are hungry for some revenge on their conference opponents.

Experience is the key with the UMass defense, but size also factors in as well. Combined with redshirt freshman Kevin Tucker and true freshman Matt Smith, the average height of the backline this season will be 6–foot–3.

Yeah, it does not matter what sport you watch, you know that is "big." UMass coach Joe Mallen likes his defense that way, but he also wants them to be fleet on their feet.

Mallen had an experience with the Bob Johnson–coached Calgary Flames in his days at UMass–Boston, and defensemen like Al Macinnis had a effect on him that still works to this day.

"Johnson was about 6–foot–1 himself, and he called all his defenseman over, and he was upset with how they played the night before," Mallen said. "When he was pointing his finger, he had to point it up at all his defensemen. It kind of left an indelible impression in my mind.

"But, you just don't take those guys, put them into a uniform and make them play defense. They have to have hands, feet and heart, and I think our guys have some special skills beyond their size."

Last season, the Minutemen allowed 1,115 shots on the duo of now–graduated goaltender Rich Moriarty and current– senior Brian Regan, with an average of 30.97 shots per game. In UMass' 23 losses, that average jumped up to 36.95 shots a game.

Those numbers are much too high, and that is what the defense has worked on this preseason.

Norton and his backline mates know there is no "me" in "team" — unless you add "at" and rearrange the letters a little bit but that is digression in its finest form.

"We're a lot more committed this year to a team defense," Norton said. "We need to get the puck out of the zone quicker, and clear it out as soon as possible but make sur the the forwards can receive it.

"Our coverage needs to be there, and we might go with more of a man–on–man coverage, so it'll be easier to see who is making the mistakes."

Prioritizing the team defense scheme has been the mission for Mallen and the coaching staff this fall, and for O'Connor, the point is getting across — more so than previous seasons.

"We want to make our team defense a priority this year, and in the past, we've worked hard on it, but we haven't made it into a solid base for our club," O'Connor said. "We're working on a lot of our defensive zone coverage in practice, and we're looking a lot better."

Regan does not hold the past indiscretions of his defensive partners against them, and he looks for much better things from his experienced backline mates this season.

All four of the senior backliners bring something different to the ice. Regan is one of the top goalies going into the HE season this year, holding the all–time saves mark at UMass. Gaffney has an offensive repertoire which blossomed last season into a 20–point performance (7 goals, 13 assists), finishing two points shy for most points scored by a defenseman in a season. Norton is one of the most intimidating players in the league at 6–foot–6, and is the defensive captain and O'Connor is solid in all areas of the game, seeing time on the power play and penalty kill units.

"Our experience is starting to show this year, and the way our defense is with the maturity we have, we should be in every game.

"I think we have a great defensive corps, especially with a great group of four that have played in Hockey East," Regan said. "It'll be tough, because Hockey East is a great offensive league, and we've seen that the last four years.

"Our experience is starting to show this year, and the way our defense is with the maturity we have, we should be in every game."

puck for a face off directly in front of Mark. As McBride, his back to the quintessential Jersey Boy, bent over to drop the puck with his butt high in the air, a silence fell over venerable Matthews Arena.

Mark, like the Metallica and Helmet he is so fond of, killed the silence with a hearty "Hey McBride, don't you dare stick that thing in my face." The ref shot right up, and dropped the puck from a more upright position while the near–by UMass fans bellowed.

Sure, there's been euphoric and unforgettable moments of triumph (wins over Maine and BC in the playoff(s) and despair (losses at Holy Cross and at BU in the playoffs), but in the end, these are the sort of memories I'll take.

- Things like Alice Bishko, sitting all alone at Mullins in a corner, dressed in white and yelling, "Go Mass Go!," from the middle of nowhere — even in our darkest hour.
- Former assistant coach Mark Dennehy in general, and what he did to his pen in the press box after we lost at Holy Cross — in particular.
- The lovely bar maid at the Portsmouth Brewery with its 8.9–percent "experimental" stout who was from Maine and lived in New Hampshire, but went to UC–Riverside.

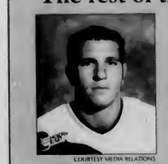
- Former Media Relations assistant and penalty box attendant for a day Charlie Bare, a non–puckhead, falling flat on his ass at center ice after being fore–warned that its slippery out there.
- One can't forget Merrimack's tapes of Huey Lewis and the News singing the national anthem, and a toilet flushing.
- College hockey: It's all about the UNH fish, PC's pinstripe uniforms, Sasquatch and T. Anthony's slices at BU, and it's the boots and chaps and cowboy hats the team will no doubt find next week in Omaha.
- Hockey East road trips...stopping at every last chance Texaco en route to the end of the world (Orono, Me. and Margarita's where Jorma was mistaken for Brad Norton by a drunken Black Bear) and putting in two bucks worth searching for a Mobil so I could charge the gas to my parents. Don't get me started on the blackout in Bangor.
- It's waking up in the middle of the night hearing BU's sieve chant, Maine's Stein Song or those obscene UNH fans with their family–oriented "bloody stumps" chant.
- Through three years and one week of working in one capacity or another with the UMass hockey team, the Minutemen have taken to the ice for a game 107 times. I've bore witness to 92 of those contests and missed 15, six of those coming in the first nine games of my freshman year.

In those 15 games, including Friday's loss at Lowell, UMass is 0–13–2. There's two ways of looking at this.

For one, it could be pointed out that I picked nice nights to take off and haven't missed anything. The other slightly more egotistical approach of course is that the team just can't win without me. I'm going to hope it's the former.

But, if anyone could convince coach Mallen that it's the latter and he needs to take me to Colorado Springs for the Air Force games, be my guest (UMass is 4–0 vs. the Falcons with me, 0–1–1 without me by the way).



That record should change this year for all the reasons on these four pages. But regardless, nothing but great UMass hockey memories will remain frozen in my mind — like my tuckus freezing to a bench at Merrimack's unheated Volpe Complex.

I have had several opportunities to stop working with hockey in favor of several other options but once a sport is in your blood, and a specific team and group of players on your mind, there's no reason to change. Yeah, one of these years I'd like to walk into the FleetCenter's media room before the Hockey East final and not have everyone wonder what on Earth I'm doing there.

Hopefully it will be different this March, providing one last great memory.

1997 UMass HOCKEY PREVIEW

Sports Extra | The Massachusetts Daily Collegian | Thursday, October 30, 1997

This season's goal for UMass is to back up senior Brian Regan

The changing of the guard starts as Regan has backup in Finnish-import Markus Helanen and sophomore returnee Dan Dileo

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

It is known that it is done.

It is a known fact that when a team loses a game, or has not played up to expectations, it seems only insanely natural to unduly place the blame squarely on a certain player's shoulders.

In the game of hockey, the blame for a loss almost always falls on the shoulders of the goaltender. It is insanely appropriate due to the fact the game is won by scoring more goals than your opponent — and you do not have to be an ex-hockey color analyst like Derek Sanderson to admit that.

For the Massachusetts hockey team, a lot of talk has centered around the goalie situation, with the play of senior incumbent Brian Regan being placed in the over-critical spotlight. Unfortunately for Regan, his outstanding play between the pipes for the Minutemen the past three years have been overshadowed by the big numbers Hockey East opponents have infrequently posted against him.

With the addition of freshman goalie Markus Helanen this season to the roster, scuttle-butt has centered on the possibility of a change in the UMass net. Helanen posted impressive numbers for Jokerit of Helsinki in the Finnish Junior A league, leading the league in goals-against-average and save percentage.

Well, all that scuttle-butt is exactly what the second half of the word says, and look for Regan to continue to be the No. 1 goalie, because he is what he is — the man in the Minuteman net.

UMass coach Joe Mallen considers it a luxury to have three quality goaltenders on his squad — the third being sophomore Dan Dileo — and the net profits will only help his team in the long run.

"We have a very healthy and a great, experienced goalie in Brian Regan, and he gives us a much more competitive edge," Mallen said. "I've never felt that one goalie can play all the games well, and now we have three good ones."

Tom O'Connor is one among the cast of senior defenseman in the Minuteman lineup, and he sees the addition of Helanen into the Minuteman lineup as beneficial for the senior netminder — supplying a little wakeup call for Regan to continue his hard work in practice.

"I think that Markus is going to help Brian a lot," O'Connor said. "In the past, I think Brian knew he was the No. 1 goalie, but with Markus around he has more competition in practice. He's going to work harder for himself knowing that Markus can step in, and I think it's going to help him out."

One for the record books

After an up and down 1996–97 season, Regan came up big for the Minutemen in the HE quarterfinals against New Hampshire. Facing the five-headed beast of forwards Eric Boguniecki, Jason Krog, Tom Nolan, Erik Nickulas and Mark Mowers — who all scored over 50 points last season — Regan set a new HE quarterfinal record of 55 saves in a 5–2 loss in the first game of the playoff series.

That kind of effort, even in a losing cause, curiously boosted Regan's morale, and he looks forward to a successful and more consistent senior season with his experienced defensive mates.

"I have a lot of confidence coming in after the playoffs against UNH last year," Regan said. "I had two huge games up there, and I think the biggest thing I need is to remain consistent throughout the year.

"With our older defense, I don't think I'll see as many shots which will enable me to be more consistent. In past seasons, where I've seen 50 shots one night and 30 the next, I haven't been able to be as good as I can be throughout the season."

Senior co-captains Brad Norton and Tim Lovell feel the decision to start Regan is one of no contest. Yet, they are also confident of the fact that a goalie of Helanen's stature (specifically 6-foot-3), can push the incumbent to make himself better than what he is now.

"All three [goalies] are great... thank God," Norton said. "Regan looks better than ever, and Markus is getting better every day. Regan deserves the job, but our goalies will be pushing him all season."

"Markus is going to be a great goalie, but he has to fine tune some things in the net first," Lovell said. "He's a big kid, and he's got some great skills, but at the moment, you have to go with Regan. He's the man, and he's one of the best in the our league.

"Like everything in the game, its your job to lose, and its the same thing with me. Its a part of life, and he is the man right now."

A long and winding road

It has been an interesting trip the last three years for Regan, but it has been just as interesting a trip for Helanen. A long and winding road to

1997–98 Hockey East Preview Capsules

Boston College Eagles

Location: Chestnut Hill
Home arena/capacity: Silvio O. Conte Forum (7,884)
Coach/career record: Jerry York (509–393–43)
'96–'97 overall/conference record: 15–19–4 (9–12–3, 6th)
Top returning players: F Marty Reasoner (35 GP, 20–22– 44); F Blake Bellefeuille (34 GP, 16–19–35); F Jeff Farkas (35 GP, 13–23–36); D Ken Hemenway (38 GP, 3–17–20).
Team synopsis: Picked to finish third in last season's preseason HE poll, the Eagles finished up a disappointing sixth place in the conference. However, a sweep at Merrimack in the HE quarterfinals did usher them to the FleetCenter, where they lost, 4–0, to UNH in the semis. Reasoner could be playing for the St. Louis Blues of the NHL right now, but Chestnut Hill life must be treating him more kindly than BC's sixth place finish did. Their superb goalie Greg Taylor has graduated, and a gaping hole is left behind in net.

Boston University Terriers

Location: Boston
Home arena/capacity: Walter Brown Arena (3,864)
Coach/career record: Jack Parker (549–257–46)
'96–'97 overall/conference record: 26–9–6 (16–4–4, T–1st)
Top returning players: F Chris Drury (41 GP, 38–24–62); F Mike Sylvia (41 GP, [illegible]); G [illegible] (38 GP, 10–28–4); G Michael [illegible]
Team synopsis: [illegible] the Terriers [illegible] to the NCAA semifinals [illegible] Brendan Morrison gets for taking the Hobey Baker award away from Drury, the HE Player of the Year and [illegible] goal scorers in recent HE history. The Terriers lost a 6–4 heartbreaker to North Dakota in the final, and sophomore forward Dan Lacouture and now-graduated Shawn Bates (Boston Bruins) to the professional ranks. Once again, it does not suck to be them, but they may be vulnerable this season with 13 freshman on their squad.

University of Maine Black Bears

Location: Orono, Maine
Home arena/capacity: Alfond Arena (5,200)
Coach/career record: Shawn Walsh (504–174–34)
'96–'97 overall/conference record: 24–10–1 (16–7–1, 3rd)
Top returning players: F Shawn Wansbrough (35 GP, 18–21–39); F Steve Kariya (35 GP, 15–31–50); F Cory Larose (35 GP, 10–27–37); G Alfie Michaud (29 GP, 17–8–1, 3.09 GAA, .864 Sv %).
Team synopsis: Even with their postseason ban due to some minor paperwork problems last season, Maine ended its shortened campaign as the hottest team in the country. The Black Bears finished their season with a 15–2 record, with Michaud going 12–1 in the last 13 games. BU and UNH are picked ahead of Maine in the preseason poll, but Walsh's team can be counted on to shake its foundation. Larose is one of the top rookies in the conference, and the team returns 19 of 26 letter winners. It would be upsetting to call them the upset special, but watch out for the Black and Blue this season.

University of Massachusetts – Amherst Minutemen

Location: Amherst
Home arena/capacity: Mullins Center (8,389)
Coach/career record: Joe Mallen (138–125–10)
'96–'97 overall/conference record: [illegible]
Top returning players: [illegible] (38 GP, [illegible]); F Steve Magiera (38 GP, [illegible]); F [illegible] (35 GP, 2–16–18); [illegible]
Team synopsis: [illegible] of the unfortunate prowess of Lovell from Maine, [illegible] hunting class since the program's reinstatement in 1991. [illegible] brighter fortunes for the Minutemen. Yet, if the team falls into its historical trap of allowing too many shots on Regan, then the senior standout goalie will only be able to do so much. An experienced defense will be key in a heavily offensive conference, and Norton — plus fellow senior backliners Mike Gaffney and Tom O'Connor — are the secrets to their success. A big early season loss was freshman forward Jeff Turner, who broke his fibula in practice a few weeks ago.

University of Massachusetts – Lowell River Hawks

Location: Lowell
Home arena/capacity: [illegible]
Coach/career record: [illegible]
'96–'97 overall/conference record: [illegible] (9–14–1, 7th)
Top returning players: [illegible] (37 GP, 16–20– 36); F Shannon Basaraba (38 GP, [illegible]); G Mike Nicholishen (38 GP, 3–22–25); G Martin Fillion ([illegible] 4.00 GAA, .882 Sv %).
Team synopsis: [illegible] Lowell lost the Alumni Cup for the second straight year [illegible] supposedly made to boost Lowell's stature as the "be[illegible]" the River Hawks made it to the FleetCenter, losing [illegible] the HE semis. Koehler was voted as HE Rookie [illegible] after him. Basaraba and All-HE selection Nicholishen [illegible] offensive production drops off. Fillion will need to fill the role as a premier puck stopper for Lowell to crack the top four teams in the conference this season.

Merrimack College Warriors

Location: North Andover
Home arena/capacity: Volpe Complex (3,013)
Coach/career record: Ron Anderson [illegible] (244–225–33)
'96–'97 overall/conference record: [illegible] (19–2[illegible]1–11–2, 5th) Top returning players: F Casey [illegible] (38 GP, [illegible]); F Rejean Stringer (34 GP, [illegible]); D Darrel Scoville (35 GP, [illegible]).
Team synopsis: [illegible] expectations last season, finishing fifth in HE [illegible] to the quarterfinals due to Maine's postseason [illegible] a disappearing act in the Volpe "inferno." [illegible] the Warriors' chances to go to the Final Four [illegible] rds return, but an All-HE selection [illegible] graduation. As with BC, Mary [illegible] between the pipes, and Cris Classen's .773 save percent is the only slightly coherent hope for the Warriors in net.

University of New Hampshire Wildcats

Location: Durham,
Home arena/capacity: [illegible] Center (6,000)
Coach/career record: [illegible]
'96–'97 overall/conference record: [illegible] (18–6, T–1st)
Top returning players: [illegible] (35 GP, [illegible]); F Tom Nolan (39 GP, 22–29–51); [illegible] (32 GP, [illegible]); Sean Matile (22 GP, 15–7–0, 3.17 [illegible]
Team synopsis: [illegible] no[illegible] your eyes because what you see is correct — U[illegible] of the [illegible] who scored over 50 points last season. [illegible] losses are significant, with gritty forward Eric Boguniecki and solid defenseman Tim Murray graduating, and forward [illegible] and yes, another [illegible] Erik Nickulas making the jump to [illegible] duties all to himself this season, as he teamed up with Brian Larochelle last season. A great team with a disappointing 3–2 loss to Colorado College in the NCAA quarterfinals last season should be at the top again.

Northeastern University Huskies

Location: Boston
Home arena/capacity: Matthews Arena (6,000)
Coach/career record: Bruce Crowder [illegible]–100–2[illegible]
'96–'97 overall/conference record: [illegible] (3–19–2, 9th)
Top returning players: G Mike [illegible] (34 GP, 7–24– 3, 4.20 GAA, .866 Sv %); F Scott Campbell [illegible] (10–12– 22).
Team synopsis: Um, yeah. [illegible] Crowder is one of the best coaches in the nation, and that qualifies [illegible] thing will be needed once again this season as the Huskies [illegible] Freehill, Reitaille is a legit goaltender, but [illegible] the Northeastern faithful [illegible] selves and they will tell you that [illegible] non-existent [illegible] Even freshman will take the historic Matthews [illegible] and St. Botolph St. might just become [illegible] it now for next season — a dead end.

Providence College Friars

Location: Providence, R.I.
Home arena/capacity: Schneider Arena (3,030)
Coach/career record: Paul Pooley (50–52–10)
'96–'97 overall/conference record: [illegible]–20–1 (12–11–1, 4th)
Top returning players: F Mike Ouellette (31 GP, 10–22– 32); F Fernando Pisani (35 GP, [illegible]); D Mike Mader (35 GP, 4–10–14).
Team synopsis: After [illegible] the PC [illegible] away from the elite two seasons ago, this might be a down year for Providence. But, even without a premier goal scorer, Pooley's defensive, neutral-zone trapping system does not cater to a [illegible] game. The loss of last season's HE Defensive Forward of the Year, Jason Dunbough to graduation will hurt that system, as well as [illegible] goalie in Dan Dennis. Junior Mark Kane came in last February to post a 4–1 record in net, so the loss of Dennis might not sting as much. Even with all of that, the preseason poll likes the Friars, picking them to finish fifth.

Mary McAleese wins Irish presidency

DUBLIN, Ireland — Mary McAleese swept past four other candidates Friday to become Ireland's next president, the second woman to win the post and the first president from across the border in Northern Ireland.

Campaigning on a pledge to "build bridges" between the peoples and faiths of the island, McAleese won 45.2 percent of the first-round votes. In the second count, she had a record share of 58.7 percent, according to RTE, the state broadcasting service. As she arrived at the election center in Dublin Castle on Friday night with Prime Minister Bertie Ahern, McAleese, 46, said she wanted to give the nation "a really warm promise... to be the very best president that I possibly can be."

McAleese was able to win even though as a resident of Northern Ireland she wasn't eligible to vote. The republic's constitution claims the province as part of the republic, thus enabling someone like McAleese to be elected to office in the south.

Her victory dramatized a fundamental reality of the conflict in Northern Ireland: Catholics north and south regard themselves as Irish, regardless of the partition that divides the island. While McAleese crossed the border to run, residents of the republic reached north across the border to elect her.

Frostburg State students found guilty

CUMBERLAND, Md. (AP) — Seven former and current university students were found guilty Friday of running an illegal fraternity party where a freshman drank himself to death.

The seven pleaded innocent to selling alcohol without a license and and were found guilty by Judge J. Frederick Sharer. In return, prosecutors dropped charges of manslaughter and reckless endangerment stemming from the death of John Stinner.

Sharer gave each of the defendants 90-day suspended jail sentences and placed them on five years of probation. They were also fined $1,000 and ordered to perform 250 hours of community service.

The 20-year-old Stinner, of Glassport, Pa., was found dead in his dormitory room at Frostburg State University on Nov. 9. He had blood-alcohol level of .34, more than three times the legal limit. Stinner drank at least six beers and 12 shots of vodka over a two-hour period at the off-campus party at Kappa Beta Zeta, one of several unsanctioned fraternities in this western Maryland town of 8,000. Students paid a $3 admission fee to the party.

Retired UMass professor reflects on his years at UMass–Amherst

By Jason Eiseman
Collegian Staff

In 1924, the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, was the Massachusetts Agricultural College. There were only two residential dormitories, North College for the men, and the Abigail Adams House for the women. Professors with names like Patterson and Prince dominated the campus. Freshman were expected to be subordinate to all upperclassmen, for fear that they would have to be called in front of the Student Senate, whose sole purpose was to enforce the rules which freshman had to follow.

"I don't worry about their protests and so on. The kids that occupy buildings now will probably end up as Republicans making a lot of money."
-Ellsworth Barnard

The College Years

Ellsworth Barnard was a freshman in 1924, and he knew that failure to follow the rules governing freshman could result in a "pond party."

Now at the age of 90, Barnard recalls his college days with a hearty laugh.

"At a pond party a freshman would have to fall on their hands and knees down the cinderwalk from North College down to the pond, between two lines of sophomores with paddles. Then they would haul them onto a platform at the end of the pond, and more husky sophomores would grab them by an arm and a leg and heave them into the pond. I really lived in terror of getting a pond party."

Barnard joined the fraternity Q.T.V., and at the encouragement of other members, began writing for the Collegian, which was not a daily at the time.

"I was not cut out for journalism. I was too shy to interview people," he said.

Barnard became managing editor in his senior year.

"I really didn't enjoy that, but I had a couple of friends who were also on the staff," he said.

Barnard also joined the freshman baseball team, because freshman were not allowed to play varsity sports at the time. "I really loved baseball, it's what I lived for. I never got to play on the varsity. I still hold it against the coach, that he didn't give me a chance to play."

"I just knew that I wanted to go to college, I didn't know what I planned to do then," Barnard said. "While I was here I decided I wanted to be an English teacher. At first I planned to go into high school teaching, but then I was talking with Professor Patterson, who was head of the department, and he asked me what I was planning to do. I told him I was going to teach high school, and he said 'oh, you're too good for that.'"

Post College Times: Professing

After graduating in 1928, Barnard joined a friend in a roadster, on a trip to the University of Minnesota, where he earned a graduate degree. He returned to UMass Amherst to teach in 1930.

He taught at the University for three years between earning his masters degree and his PhD.

"I taught at the University of Tampa, Williams Wisconsin and Alfred University, University of Chicago and Northern Michigan University," said Barnard, who was a professor at these schools before returning to UMass in 1968.

"I was trying to find a place where I wanted to stay and where the administration wanted me to stay. Some places I would've liked to stay but didn't have a chance, some places I could've stayed but chose not to. Finally the two things came together at UMass," he said.

Barnard tried to enlist to serve this country in World War II.

"Later I was drafted, and again was turned down, again I don't know why exactly. One doctor who examined me said 'we'd be spoiling a good teacher to make a poor soldier'."

Here and Now

In 1973, Barnard retired from teaching, but still tries to stay abreast of current trends at the University, but he is not abreast of some of the advancements the University has made.

"I know nothing about computers, and at my age I figure I don't have to," he said.

"I'm bothered about what I read about the drinking on campus," Barnard said about students today. "I don't worry about their protests and so on. The kids that occupy buildings now, will probably end up as Republicans making a lot of money."

Today Barnard lives in North Amherst with his wife, Mary Taylor Barnard, a marriage which has spanned 60 years. They have endowed a scholarship for a UMass student, and he has published four volumes of his autobiography, In Sunshine and in Shadow: A Teacher's Odyssey.

Book, lecture take a look at French popular culture

By Joseph Fountain
Collegian Staff

On Tuesday, Nov. 2, the University of Massachusetts will sponsor a lecture by renowned French historian Charles Rearick, professor of history at UMass. The lecture, titled "On the French and the Social Imaginary: From Maurice Chevalier to Piaf and Trenet," will be held in Herter Hall, room 231 on the UMass campus at 4:30 p.m.

The lecture will deal with French popular culture between the beginning of World War I and the ending of World War II and how the French dealt with the tragedies of the wars and the inter-war years.

Rearick will use his research on the cultural icons Chevalier, Piaf and Trenet to demonstrate that their work appealed to the French because it provided them with the means to understand their social worlds during this time period.

The presentation of the lecture will include musical excerpts and slides of film posters and music sheets which were illustrated.

"The range goes from Chevalier who is a pretty up beat guy to the tragic songstress Piaf," Rearick said.

The lecture promises to be enlightening for all those interested in France and how popular culture helps people to deal with tragedy and war. There will be a reception following the lecture.

Rearick is the author of The French in love and war: Popular Culture in the Era of the World Wars, a book recently published by Yale University Press. The book is a new study of film and popular music in the 1920s and '30s.

According to Katherine Elaine Bliss, professor of history at UMass, Rearick's book represents a continuation of the ground breaking research that he started in his previous book, Pleasures of the Belle Epoque: Entertainment and Festivity in the Turn-of-the-Century France.

The French in love and war: Popular Culture in the Era of the World Wars represents 12 years of research for Rearick, who flew back and forth from Amherst to Paris during his summers and a semester sabbatical. Rearick has taught classes at UMass on French and European history since 1968.

The book has over 120 illustrations and is based on extensive research of French musical recordings and film.

The book has received critical acclaim from The New York Times Book Review, Sunday Times Book Review, The Irish Times and The Times Literary Supplement.

"By looking at the French popular culture, you can see what type of coping devices they had and the myths they hold about themselves," Rearick said.

Work out to be healthy, not thin

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Correspondent

Eat right and exercise to be healthy, not to lose weight, said Pat Lyons, a registered nurse and author of Great Shape in a talk given with colleague Dr. Cheri Erdman last Friday.

"This whole idea that if you're thin, you're healthy and if you're fat, that you aren't healthy is controversial" said Lyons who is working for Kaiser Permanente developing programs for the health and self care for large people.

Erdman, professor and counselor at the College of DuPage, specializing in body image and self esteem of large women, said that people need to change the environment that makes fat such a stigma and makes people focus only on body appearance and not health.

According to Erdman, one sign of this stigma is that, "We don't have a word that describes a body type bigger than Kate Moss with positive connotations."

Erdman said because the environment is so hostile towards overweight people that the embarrassment about their body keeps them from exercising.

"Some people won't go to the gym until they lose weight. That kind of thinking seems kind of ridiculous," Erdman said.

Lyons also said that part of the environment that needs to change involves doctors. Lyons regularly speaks to doctors and advises them that they "need to assess, not assume about that person in front of you based on their body size." She said that often times overweight people develop health problems because they are too embarrassed to go to the doctors office until the problem is so bad that they absolutely have to go.

Lyons said to help change the environment "we have to change the visuals. Large people need to see positive images of themselves. Instead of looking at before and after pictures we should look at now."

"We need to look at the research which shows that the problems of an overweight person who doesn't exercise are the same as a thin person who doesn't exercise," Lyons said. "It's not the fact that someone is overweight, it's if they don't live healthfully that causes problems."

The talk was sponsored by the UMass School of Public Health and Health Sciences, the exercise science department, and the Body Shop fitness center.

Chinese president ends U.S. trip

By Michael Fleeman
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Chinese President Jiang Zemin received a red-carpet greeting from business partners yesterday but faced hundreds of protesters outside his speech to political leaders and Hollywood executives.

Officials of Hughes Electronics, owned by General Motors Corp., showed Jiang automotive and satellite technology being sold to his country and he wished Hughes "continued success."

"I believe that this will further promote cooperation," Jiang said in English during a tour of Hughes offices on the final day of his eight-day U.S. trip.

After a stop at a separate Hughes satellite-manufacturing plant, Jiang traveled to Beverly Hills for a speech at the Hilton Hotel there. Outside, more than 600 chanting, sign-waving demonstrators protested China's human-rights record and policies toward Tibet and Taiwan.

"I think it is ridiculous for America to accept (his) visit here with all his human rights violations," said Tashi Chodron, a board member of the Tibet Association of Northern California. Protesters have dogged Jiang throughout his visit.

After Hughes, Jiang had lunch with Gov. Pete Wilson and was to address business and entertainment elite before a dinner with Chinese-Americans.

Amtrak–union agreement ends threat of strike

By Calvin Woodward
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A labor agreement reached yesterday between Amtrak and maintenance workers averted a possible national passenger rail strike that would have disrupted travel for hundreds of thousands.

The threat of a shutdown had hung for months over long-distance passengers nationally and daily commuters in a half-dozen major cities, just as the railroad has been fighting off bankruptcy. The settlement gives workers "a fair and deserved [wage] increase while preserving the financial integrity of the company," the Amtrak chairman, Tom Downs, said.

For the agreement to hold, congressional approval is required for an Amtrak rescue package already under consideration on Capitol Hill. That package has been stalled in Congress over provisions that would relax some labor protections.

Transportation Secretary Rodney Slater, who brought the parties together for days of talks that stretched overnight into yesterday, urged lawmakers to act quickly.

A prolonged shutdown would have forced Amtrak's 54,000 daily passengers to find other travel and could have led to the suspension of commuter rail services for more than 500,000 people in the Boston, Chicago, Los Angeles, Philadelphia, New York and Washington metropolitan areas.

Apart from its long-distance services, Amtrak provides urban rail commuter transportation under contract in some cities. Overall, Amtrak serves 500 communities, scores of them with no air or city-to-city bus transportation.

The tentative three-year contract gives the 2,300 members of the Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Employees a wage increase each year, but it will amount to less than the annual 3 percent raise proposed earlier by mediators.

Officials refused to give details until the contract goes for ratification to workers and the Amtrak board. After the parties agreed last week to extend negotiations for eight days past Tuesday's midnight deadline, a strike could have started as early as Thursday of this week.

Slater announced the deal at a news conference, flanked by Downs and Jed Dodd, the union's general chairman.

"This landmark agreement establishes a new partnership of management and labor at Amtrak for enhanced productivity and real savings, while providing a fair wage increase for workers," Slater said.

"Thanks for staying up for four days," President Clinton told them in a call from Air Force One while flying to New Jersey from Florida. "Get some sleep."

Clinton intervened in the summer, invoking his authority to delay the strike and appointing an emergency mediation board. The original strike date of Oct. 22 passed without a walkout.

Congress had been considering stepping in to delay a strike further when the parties resumed talks.

"This is a significant breakthrough," said Sen. Frank Lautenberg of New Jersey, senior Democrat on the Transportation Appropriations Subcommittee. "Now Congress has to... keep this agreement from careening off track."

Slater dodged when asked if the deal would fall apart without approval of the proposed rescue package. But there was no doubt the settlement places pressure on Congress and the administration to resolve their differences over the struggling federally subsidized railroad.

The federal balanced budget sets aside $2.3 billion for better equipment but specifies the money will be released only after Congress passes legislation to overhaul the way Amtrak does business.

As defined in the legislation, the changes would let Amtrak contract out more work, reduce other labor protections and focus more on its profitable routes. The legislation also provides $3.4 billion for Amtrak to operate through 2000.

Clinton and many congressional Democrats oppose linking the money to rolled-back labor safeguards.

Without a major infusion, Amtrak may go broke in a few months. The labor dispute had compounded problems — Downs said Amtrak has been losing passengers because of the prospect of a strike. As it turned out, said Slater, "not a single Amtrak passenger or local commuter missed a train as a result of this dispute." And with the deal, he said, Americans "can depend on a new and vigorous Amtrak."

Find a new route to work: U.S. bridges in need of repair

By Jonathan D. Salant
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Almost a third of the nation's bridges are dilapidated or too narrow or too weak to carry the traffic crossing them, federal records show. In many state capitals, as in Washington, officials say the money's just not there to fix them. In Vermont, a trade group worries about the safety of a bridge frequently used by state lawmakers to reach Montpelier.

"If they could see that bridge from underneath, they'd take another route to the capital," said Thom Serrani, executive director of the Associated Industries of Vermont.

In Jacksonville, Fla., heavy trucks and buses are being detoured around the Fuller Warren Bridge on Interstate 95, the East Coast's major north-south artery. State engineers said the larger vehicles were literally shaking the bridge to pieces.

And in the nation's capital, where lawmakers are debating how to spend federal gasoline tax revenues for the next six years, the Potomac River's busiest span is a symbol of bridge decay.

Construction crews can frequently be seen replacing asphalt along the Woodrow Wilson drawbridge, which carries traffic of I-95 and I-495 — the famed Capitol Beltway — around Washington. Engineers warn the structure has only seven years before heavy trucks must be banned. Local leaders are trying to persuade Congress to pick up most of $1.6 billion price tag to replace it. An Associated Press computer analysis of Federal Highway Administration data found 182,730 of the nation's 581,942 bridges — 31.4 percent — were rated deficient as of June 30, 1996.

One of every four bridges on the National Highway System, the backbone of America's road network, is obsolete or has structural problems, according to the highway administration's 1997 report to Congress.

Most deficient bridges are not in danger of collapse. Some simply are too narrow to handle current traffic loads. But others need major repairs, soon.

"Traveling through virtually any city, you see the bridges crumbling over your head," said Bill Jackman, a spokesman for the AAA motor club, which has warned that too little is being spent to maintain bridges.

A decade after 10 people died when a New York State Thruway bridge plunged into a rain-swollen creek in one of the nation's worst bridge disasters, that state has the highest percentage of deficient bridges: 60.5 percent. Hawaii and Massachusetts reported more than half their bridges deficient.

In West Virginia, where 45.4 percent of the bridges are substandard, officials are keeping a wary eye on the creaky 66-year-old Shadle Bridge near the Ohio border.

Inspectors say it is still safe, but local residents fear a repeat of the nearby Silver Bridge collapse in 1967 that claimed 46 lives, the nation's worst bridge disaster.

That accident spurred a nationwide review of bridges and led to the federal requirement that bridges be inspected regularly. There have been more recent wake-up calls as well.

Two years ago, five people died when an Interstate 5 bridge near Coalinga, Calif., gave way to raging waters. For at least five years before that accident, engineers had been developing flood-control plans that might have prevented the collapse. An expansion joint on a Connecticut Turnpike bridge over the Quinnipiac River near New Haven popped out twice last April, snarling traffic along I-95.

In New Hampshire, officials and contractors have seen marked improvement since the state highway commissioner declared in 1994 that motorists should "drive fast and not look back" when crossing bridges.

The number of bridges on New Hampshire's "red list" for repairs has shrunk by 140, a fifth of the total, since the graphic remark.

Lacking money to repair all bridges, highway engineers are taking other precautions. One in five bridges limits the weight of vehicles allowed to cross.

Heavy trucks are banned from the older of the twin Cooper River Bridges just north of Charleston, S.C., on U.S. 17, a main route to the state's coastal resorts. The bridge was built in 1929. State and local transportation officials say they are working to reduce the backlog of bridge repairs, but their money is limited in an era of balanced budgets and tax cuts.

In Montana, for example, county property taxes have been frozen since 1986.

"Even routine maintenance is suffering," said Gordon Morris, executive director of the Montana Association of Counties. "Counties are really stymied in being able to cope with it." Making matters worse is that most of the bridges built during the 1960s and 1970s were designed to last 30 years and soon will require major repairs.

"They're sort of the baby-boomer bridges, all aging at the same time," said Tom Lulay, deputy director of the Oregon Transportation Department.

Fewer minority students entering medical school

By Kalpana Srinivasan
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The number of minorities entering U.S. medical schools dropped this year, most drastically in states affected by affirmative-action rollbacks.

The Association of American Medical Colleges released a study Saturday of the nation's 125 accredited medical schools that showed an 11 percent drop in blacks, American Indians, Mexican-Americans, Chicanos and Puerto Ricans applying to medical schools. In addition, 6.8 percent fewer of those minority students were accepted for 1997 than in 1996.

Some educators fear the figures show that actions of a federal court in Texas and the voters of California to end educational preferences for minorities are echoing through the nation. Minorities are discouraged from applying, and administrators have become overly cautious about admissions policies, they say.

"This is an ominous sign for the medical community and our nation, which badly needs a physician work force that is both diverse and reflective of our society as a whole," the association's president, Jordan J. Cohen, said.

He said the downturn is clearly linked to Proposition 209, with which California's electorate ended affirmative action in state institutions, and the Hopwood federal court decision in Texas. Together, they ended affirmative action in four states.

According to the report, 17 percent fewer minority students applied to their state medical schools in California and in Texas, Mississippi and Louisiana, states covered by the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals decision that affirmative action is unconstitutional. The number accepted in the four states plunged by 27 percent.

"The threat to affirmative action in many states is sending the signal to minority students that they are unwelcome," said Hector Garza, vice president for access and equity programs at the American Council on Education.

The council conducts its own annual status report on minorities in higher education, which showed slight progress in minority matriculation until 1995-96.

"Just as we were beginning to see some upward mobility at all levels of the educational pipeline, we see this backlash to affirmative action having an adverse effect," Garza said.

One group that studies problems involving racial preferences, the American Civil Rights Institute, cautioned against attributing national fluctuations to the two California and Texas events. "It is a leap of logic... to assume that changes in California and Texas graduate schools account for this nationwide trend," said executive director Jennifer Nelson, who had not seen the report.

But educators at institutions outside those states said they have witnessed the impact of the rollbacks firsthand.

Dr. R. Allen-Noble, associate dean of special academic programs at the Medical College of Georgia, said the school's minority enrollment has suffered since it revoked scholarships for minorities in 1996. Allen-Noble said the state's former attorney general declared the scholarships illegal in light of the Hopwood decision.

"Institutions are so afraid of a lawsuit that they are being overly cautious," she said Saturday at the American Association of Medical Colleges' annual meeting in Washington.

Allen-Noble said while the school is striving for more applications overall, it will have to combat an image of being unfriendly to minorities.

Dr. Cornelius Hopper, vice president for health affairs for the University of California, had similar worries last spring after noticing a 22 percent drop in minority applicants at the state's five medical schools.

Hopper said the school has not surrendered its goal of diversity among its students and will try to reach out for more minority applicants.

"Ultimately the people who fashion public policy will have to deal with questions of educational opportunity," Hopper said. Otherwise, he fears, "gains that had been made in getting minorities to professional ranks will be allowed to disintegrate."

Au pair verdict may be reduced

By Jean McMillan
Associated Press

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. — Prosecutors said yesterday they had not decided whether to fight if British au pair Louise Woodward's murder conviction is reduced to manslaughter.

Superior Court Judge Hiller B. Zobel invited both sides to argue whether he should reduce Woodward's second-degree murder conviction to manslaughter, dismiss the verdict or order a new trial, the three options he is allowed under state law. Woodward has denied cracking the skull of the 8-month-old boy in her charge.

Written motions were due today and a hearing is scheduled for tomorrow. Woodward's lawyers were expected to seek some change in the conviction and the prosecution said it was flexible only on the issue of a reduction.

"At this stage we would certainly appeal any decision to throw out the verdict or order a new trial," said Martha Coakley, one of the prosecutors.

"On the third issue, as to whether he reduces it or not, we oppose it, but if he were to do that we would evaluate at the time what action we would take," she said.

The lead prosecutor, Gerard Leone Jr., told MSNBC "we would be reasonable" if the conviction is reduced to manslaughter "and listen to anything which is placed before us."

The 19-year-old Woodward was convicted Thursday of fatally shaking Matthew Eappen and striking his head against a hard surface. She was sentenced Friday to a mandatory sentence of life in prison without parole eligibility for 15 years.

The defense, which gambled and lost when it asked the judge to eliminate manslaughter from jury consideration, had argued their case in front of three mock juries before the trial and all returned innocent verdicts, said a source close to the defense who spoke on condition of anonymity.

The case continued to raise tempers on both sides of the Atlantic. About 25 protesters in Britain demanding the release of Woodward lit candles in flower pots and wrapped a yellow ribbon around a tree outside the U.S. Embassy as they waited for Hillary Rodham Clinton to arrive.

The first lady had been on a speaking tour in Northern Ireland and was attending a reception at the embassy. But she was driven through a rear entrance of the compound and missed the protest. Some of Woodward's American supporters planned a rally today outside the Cumbridge courthouse where she was convicted.

Opinion polls show that many in the United States and Britain, where the trial was televised, believe Woodward was unjustly convicted.

At least one juror has said she and her colleagues would have preferred to find her guilty of manslaughter, which carries a maximum penalty of 20 years in prison. If convicted of manslaughter, Woodward could have been sentenced to probation and avoided prison altogether.

must have built a relationship of the understanding, the mutual respect and the trust that will be required to resolve them," Wilson said in prepared remarks.

In January, Wilson met Jiang during a trade mission to Asia and discussed services and technologies that California companies can offer China. California's sixth-largest trading partner with exports of more than $3 billion in the first half of the year. Jiang was warmly greeted by Hughes and GM officials, who do billions of dollars in business with China. Jiang looked at exhibits describing communication satellites that Hughes builds and China launches with its rockets.

He also sat in the passenger seat of a Buick Regal, which will be built in China next year.

Company officials demonstrated GM's new service using satellite technology in which drivers who lock their keys in the car can call a telephone number and have the doors opened. The same service includes a car location feature.

For the demonstration, a remote operator honked the car's horn and flashed the lights. Before triggering the horn, the operator said "Please hold" and put the president of China on hold. Jiang joked about the two Smith brothers in attendance: Michael T. Smith, head of Hughes Electronics, and brother John F. Smith, head of GM.

"Now I know you are brothers because your face is very similar," said Jiang, prompting laughter from hundreds of Hughes and GM employees.

In welcoming Jiang, Michael Smith said he hoped the trade agreement accomplished more than economic benefits.

"It has been my belief that we cannot calculate the value of our business activities in jobs and economic growth alone," he said. "Such interaction as we have enjoyed also brings us together as peoples."

■ Barnard

He picked up the second volume of his autobiography and began to read a passage to elaborate on his feelings about students.

"I have always loved college students. Always at the beginning of a course, I entered the classroom with a thrill of anticipation, and felt a surge of warmth as I scanned the faces of the waiting students; and I was eager as I called the roll, to see who would answer to each name and to get some impression of what the person was like. And always, after the last meeting of the year, I would experience a profound feeling of emptiness and loss. I can appreciate the humor of the familiar comment that college would be a great place if it were not for the students," but I myself have never viewed a deserted campus without a feeling of melancholy."

Barnard is an inseparable piece of the history of the University of Massachusetts. He laughed again as he finished reading the passage from his book, and asked why students should feel an increasing dependence on drugs and alcohol.

"One can offer a kind of negative defense by asking why we should expect students to be better than their elders. But this defense is irrelevant, because, in fact, they are more generous, more sensitive, more open-minded, more responsive to efforts in their behalf. Their faults are the faults of society; their virtues are their own," he closed the book, reciting the final line from memory.

Yearbook Staff Prepares for Record Turnout

By Arnold Layne
Index Archives

Amherst- For the 129th year in a row, the UMass Yearbook Club begins production on the University's prestigious Index, this year however, will be designed and published not only as the 129th yearbook by the Index, but also the first to present the yearbook as a tour guide to the University of Massachusetts at Amherst.

Asked on whether or not graduation seniors will be part of the yearbook, Managing Editor Loretta Kwan said "This year's book will not only include (Seniors), but will also include useful information on places to eat, places to go out to and also places to go when you're not feeling too well. There are a lot of places in this book. It's great!"

"Seniors will have to call the DaVor number to get in the yearbook. And quick." replied Editor-in-chief Jill Aordkian when asked how seniors will get in the book. "Last year we couldn't get all the Seniors in the book because they didn't get their photo taken soon enough."

This year the Index will be extending it's Senior Photo Shoot to allow for thousands of Seniors to get their photo in the book. Director of Marketing Sean Marien added "Seniors should call the number immediately. The earlier you call, the better chance you have to get in the book." The number to call for appointments is 1-800-836-05f58, and Seniors are encouraged to call as soon as possible during normal business hours.

> "The earlier you call, the better chance you have to get in the book." -Sean Marien

"You have to call, you can't get around that." Photo Editor Aaron Eccles reply to if there was another way for Seniors to get in the book. "If you don't call, you can't get in, you just can't! There's no way."

"There's no need to worry, every students who gets their photo taken is put in the book, well except that once but....." said Kwan on the likeliness of not getting in the book. "Just call the number and show up. That's it."

A new feature of the 1998 Index is the addition of the Grad Edition. "The Grad Edition is the best thing this campus has seen since the invention of the disposable lighter" Copy Editor Sean Maguire commented. The Grad Edition comes with the purchase of each yearbook. The Grad Edition will be available to Seniors before commencement, which gives graduates the opportunity to give parting comments to their friends in school.

President Clinton and Chancellor Scott were contacted about the Grad Edition, however both were unavailable for comment.

UMass must put students first

The University is engaged in a comprehensive campaign. Campaign UMass, designed to raise funds, enlist advocates and increase the prestige of the institution.

We applaud the administration and Alumni Association's efforts to improve the University for students through this campaign.

However, it is essential for the administration to realize it must also have good relations with its current students.

Enhancing the outside image of the University is a fruitless endeavor if students, once they get here, have a poor experience because the administration seems to act in a hostile and impenetrable manner — for instance, in the distribution of the Guidelines for Responses to Demonstrations on University Property to the entire campus community at the start of the semester.

For far too long there has been a mindset of the bureaucracy vs. the students on this campus, issues such as those surrounding the Goodell Takeover, or the contract demands of the Graduate Employee Organization, could be resolved if the administration actually began listening to and responding to student needs directly.

Members of the administration need to participate in University life — by attending campus events and interacting with students — and a better forum for students to express their opinions to the administration should be established.

The administration should also be marketing its initiatives (such as the Commonwealth College) on campus, not just to wealthy alumni or powerful legislatures. After all, these initiatives will ultimately fail without the support of the student body.

Administration treatment of GEO is a scandal

To the Editor:

How wonderful it was to discover the Collegian online! I graduated from UMass in 1993, and have been in graduate school in Minnesota for a couple of years. Finding the Collegian online made me feel like an undergraduate again, especially since it seems that the University Administration still doesn't get it! I was a student at UMass when the Graduate Employee Organization first organized. When the Teaching Assistants went on strike, everything shut down.

Later, when I became a TA as a grad student and a GEO member, I was well-represented during the second round of contract negotiations by people who weren't out to gouge the University. The members of GEO and all the Teaching Assistants only wanted what was fair in return for the responsibility laid upon us by our departments.

The Administration in its current refusal to bargain with GEO seems to have forgotten that without the Teaching Assistants, there is no University! If we don't learn from the mistakes of history, we are doomed to repeat them, someone once said. I hope that the Administration paid attention in class last time around! Come on Whitmore! Twenty months without a contract is a scandal and you should know better.

List of terrorist groups not a sign of racism

To the Editor:

This is written in response to the article titled "The New McCarthyism" (Oct. 28).

Regarding Mr. Ibish's groundless attack, groups placed on the Foreign Terrorist Organizations list are not simply "charitable, nonviolent" organizations. The groups listed by Mr. Ibish (Hamas, Hizballa) in addition to other similar groups such as Islamic Jihad and the Palestinian Liberation Front prey upon innocent civilians who are completely unaffiliated with the military, simply to advance their political causes. These groups are not imagined enemies as with the red scare, they are very real as any family who has lost a child to a bus bombing knows.

In addition to this, one must define what a member of a group is. I define it as anyone who participates in the activities of that group. So, in line with this, a person who solicits funds for an openly terroristic group is a member of that group because he has acted vicariously through that group by allowing them to commit whatever atrocity is on the agenda. Because of this, it is fair common sense to retard the immigration or activity of a person affiliated with any terrorist group. This list is not racism, this list is not McCarthyism, this is a well-evaluated warning.

On-campus computer resources a real need

To the Editor:

Eli Slater recently sent a letter to the editor arguing for increased access to computer facilities and questioning some of the policies in the Biology Computer Resource Center (BCRC).

I agree wholeheartedly with Eli Slater that students need better access to networked computers and that students should turn to the Office of Information Technologies (OIT) to raise awareness for their unmet needs. Two years ago the Biology Department, recognizing these needs, sought funding from the Howard Hughes Medical Institute (HHMI) and committed $200,000 to creating, operating and staffing a computer classroom. Since its creation, the BCRC has been available for general life sciences computing whenever it is not reserved for courses. The BCRC steering committee believes it is important to staff the BCRC to: (1) answer questions and help our clientele, (2) protect against theft and vandalism and (3) encourage the appropriate use of the resources. We place few real restrictions on the use of the facility, but not even our entire budget would staff the lab 24 hours per day, let alone provide for supplies, repairs, and software upgrades.

The Biology Department, like others, is offering increasing educational resources through technology, including web pages, simulations and discussion forums. We recognize that these resources are useful to students only to the extent that they are able to gain access to them. We, in the Biology Department, are therefore seeking renewed funding from HHMI to continue and expand the BCRC. We use student sign-ins as evidence to help make our case that the resources are well-utilized and deserve increased support. But we recognize that even with the requested expansion, our resources will be insufficient to support all our student needs. For that reason, we strongly support the idea that additional resources from the University as a whole should be used to provide increased access to computer technology across campus.

Dr. Steven D. Brewer, Director
Biology Computer Resource Center

Reader supports new picketing code

To the Editor:

I was not happy reading in Wednesday's Collegian that the students' position on the picketing code was made clear by the recent referendum. It's not. Along with many other students, I fully support the revisions made to this code.

I was extremely frustrated last semester when students marched up and down the hallways of Bartlett yelling "walk out," while I was in a class trying to learn something. Do people leading these disruptions stop to think about the students who are actually here to get an education and earn a degree? Most of us are students at the University for only roughly four to five years and we're paying money to be here. Stop interrupting our lives.

The Collegian reports that approximately 2,400 students turned out to vote. This includes voting on referendums like the picketing code.

According to the UMass Office of Institutional Research, the head count of undergraduates and Stockbridge is 18,113 students. Obviously, 15,713 students really didn't care about the elections and do not want their educations disrupted. This poses a problem.

As a senior trying very hard to complete a degree in information technology, I have been going to all of my classes every day this semester. I do not want any of them interrupted because of TA walkouts, protests, or building takeovers. This is what the picketing code prevents — disruption of campus operations.

More specifically, the code labels improper actions that "disrupt instructional activities, other University business and campus events; actual threats of physical violence or other forms of harassment, or destruction of University, other public or private property; interference with free entry to or exit from University facilities and free movement by individuals: and interference with the rights of other members of the University community to freedom of speech and assembly, and other rights."

Sit back and think about this issue. I am paying my own way through college as are many of my fellow students. We have to take advantage of every class, lab, seminar and workshop that comes our way and make sure we receive the education we're paying for. Don't take that away from us.

Death penalty is wrong

To the Editor:

I would just like to say how I agree with Jeffrey R. Yusah in his column on the death penalty. For myself, I think it is wrong to kill another person, period. Regardless of what they may have done, it is no one's right or responsibility to decide who shall live and who shall die. As Yusah pointed out, what are you trying to prove by killing a murderer? To quote Malcom X, "An eye for an eye leaves everyone blind."

Coexisting peacefully

Two years ago I stood outside the Israeli Embassy in Washington, DC with over two hundred other university students mourning the tragic assassination of Prime Minister Yizhak Rabin, a man who was murdered because of his determination to bring peace to the Middle East. I, like so many others, then vowed to stop — stop the finger-pointing, the hate-filled slurs, the tallies and the terrorism.

Lissa Loeb

I took this vow with me during the six months I spent studying in an Israeli university and traveling throughout Israel and Jordan. I lived in a growing city, Beer-Sheva, which is home to many Bedouin, Arabs, veteran Israelis and new immigrants from Russia and Ethiopia. There, I learned that people of different religious, cultural and socio-economic backgrounds can coexist peaceably in the Middle East. We studied, volunteered and worked together. We rode the buses together and shopped in the shuk, the open air marketplace, talking and laughing together as we searched for fresh produce.

I took this vow with me on a trek through Jordan where my friends and I were struck by the overwhelming warmth and hospitality that greeted us. Everywhere we went, people welcomed us with a cup of shai, or tea, and invited us to sit and talk. A new friend, Ali, led us on a six hour hike through Wadi Mussa (the river bed formed, local culture believes, when Moses struck a rock for water) to the top a mountain where Aaron, the brother of Moses, is buried according to local culture. On this hike I was struck by how similar — and different — Ali's life had been. Yet, when we reached the top, and looked out over Egypt, Jordan, and Israel, I realized how interconnected everyone in the Middle East is.

The Israelis and Arabs, Bedouins and Druze, Jews, Christians and Muslims, share common lands, soils, histories, and cultures. That semester, I woke up to the bombs and shootings on a regular basis. Here at UMass, we as students, staff and faculty are lucky not to have to dodge terrorism the way that entire region does. It is time to stop inciting anger and violence. The Middle East is not and cannot be a contest of who suffered more or what type of revenge is necessary for this cause or that crime.

True, many political, economic, and social concerns and barriers need to be addressed within the region. There are a million and one different views on each issue — there will be no easy, clear-cut solutions and no one is going to just move away. As a campus, we must begin to build understanding and work towards a commitment for peaceful, multi-cultural, co-existence both here at UMass and in the Middle East.

Lissa Loeb is a recent graduate of The George Washington University and the UMass Jewish Campus Service Corps Fellow.

The devil's weed

[Editor's note: This is the first weekly installment of a month-long series that will examine the rise on campus and in Amherst of a new Puritanism and its War against Pleasure].

"There is a Corrupt Nature in thy children, which is a fountain of all Wickedness and Confusion" — Cotton Mather

The Puritan tradition runs deep in the culture of Olde New England, land of Cotton Mather, stocks and pillories and the Salem Witch Trials.

Hussein Ibish

In Amherst, a renewed spirit of Puritanism is waging relentless war on those forces of darkness which threaten the human soul with the wanton evils of pleasure. Driven by a "save the children" zealotry, this crusade mainly targets students.

The four deadly sins under neo-puritan assault are smoking, drinking, talking and having sex. That such little pleasures are among the elements of life that make it most worth living is a central issue, for what we are really facing is a major offensive by a growing culture of mediocrity and conformity that stifles the soul in the name of saving it.

This semester, the culture of mediocrity has taken its gloves off and is quickly and visibly draining UMass and Amherst of a great deal of its essential humanity.

The ban on smoking, which is by now almost total, is a good case in point.

The anti-smoking crusade poses as a war for the health of others, but in fact it is about promoting the day when tobacco consumption is banished from the face of the earth. That is why the bans, which purport to "protect" non-smokers from second hand smoke, in fact are so broad as to eliminate smoking altogether.

These insidious blanket bans have, like a loathsome and noxious fungus, spread from area to area, systematically eliminating spaces where smoking is permitted.

Chancellor Scott, that fine Presbyterian gentleman, issued a campus-wide smoking ban as one of his first actions in office. This nanny-state approach to administration — in loco parentis for students, faculty and staff — has been one of the chief characteristics of his lamentable tenure.

In town, smoking in public places has been all but eliminated, with the last refuge, the tormented bars, being threatened with [illegible] and American Revolution. But, of course, the pure hearts and saviors in the Public Health Department can see past the devil's trickery and in the ridiculous name of worker safety are set to issue their pious edict.

And at this point only the propertied class, those who own their own homes, can be assured of a place to indulge their wicked craving for a cigarette, since most landlords increasingly insist on tobacco chastity. Given the outdoor temperature for much of the year in this ice-bucket of a state, this comes close to a total ban for cigarette smokers and even closer for those who have sunk to the level of cigar debauchery.

Of course, the hideous lessons of the drug prohibitions, which have burdened this country with one of the largest peace-time prison populations in the history of civilization and criminalized millions of otherwise innocent people, are lost on the crusaders.

It is incomprehensible to the holy warriors that banning a sublime substance like tobacco, which has always been associated with the transcendental and mystical as well as certain health risks, will in many cases only heighten its appeal.

As Richard Klein has so eloquently pointed out, no group of people, perhaps, has ever been exposed to such a relentless and ubiquitous propaganda campaign as the current generation of American teenagers has been to the explosion of smoking in the teenage population.

One day this madness will come to be seen for what it is — the sublimation of a bizarre nexus of social and sexual frustrations which has transformed a set of valid and moderate controls on public smoking into a hysterical crusade against satanic indulgence.

"It is incomprehensible to the holy warriors that banning a sublime substance like tobacco, which has always been associated with the transcendental and mystical as well as certain health risks, will in many cases only heighten its appeal."

Until then I console myself with the determination that, before I graduate, I will burst into the Chancellor's inner office as a counter-exorcist, fire up one of Comandante Fidel's magnificent Bolivar Royal Coronas, and drive out the foul stench of Puritanism with the sweet scent of glorious sin.

All Welcome to the Nuyorican Poets Cafe, Servin' up the knowledge for the masses

The process of writing is simply about time and quantity. The longer and more one writes, the better he/she becomes in the process. The author must be able to take a blank page and bring it to life with words and sentences. He takes the reader through a literary adventure by using skills that leave one asking for more and more. This ability to keep the reader in suspense is taught by many institutions but is learned by few individuals. Only the chosen few who work at this craft become masters of the word. In my experience, the best writers come in the form of bards and griots. These artists are known today as poets and spoken word artists. They're small in numbers and are usually members of the black and Latino literary community. They are literary masters, but will not be found in bookstores or malls.

"A people's history comes to life when it is written. With no written records, they have no past to define who they are."

Jaime "Shaggy" Flores

The black and Latino communities have a history of writing that predates European and American history. Africans and Latin Americans were using hieroglyphics and pictographs before the Greeks discovered papyrus. Even though the ancestors of the Diaspora have such a long history of writing, they have long been ignored by the publishing establishment. Racist ideology has allowed publishers to refuse the Diaspora's writing and historical accomplishments. A people's history comes to life when it is written, with no written records they have no past to define who they are. Publishers hope that by denying an audience through mass production of material, black and Latino writers would never have the chance to emerge. This all changed in the '70s with the coming of the "Nuyorican Poet's Cafe." The cafe emerged as a place where Diaspora poets could perform their craft and feel comfortable. New York would be the location of this literary resurrection. It was the Harlem Renaissance all over again.

Writers must produce a great amount of material in order to become proficient. But for the participants of the "Nuyorican Poet's Cafe" writing was a task which they had grown to hate and deplore. To handicap these artists even more was the fact that a large number of the Latino poets could only speak "Spanglish," a hybrid of Spanish and English. The New York education system had failed in its attempt to teach the Puerto Rican people English and basic writing skills. But the residents of the Lower East Side did not perceive these obstacles as handicaps; instead a new language was created. The language became bonafide when the words, that were once used only orally, took shape on paper. One of the most powerful examples of this new language was the actual word "Nuyorican," which literally meant a Puerto Rican person from New York or the culture which developed from that community. No school system or publisher could impede the development of these words and feelings. At the Cafe, in the middle of the ghetto, where people with little to no formal education gathered to express the cries of their oppressed souls, poets would emerge and influence future generations.

Miguel Algarin and Miguel Pinero, two poets who were celebrated for their oral presentations, established the Cafe. It was born from their frustrations. For many years they were denied acceptance by the white poetry scene. After the opening of the Cafe, many people flocked to its location to hear its poets. People like Sandra Maria Esteves, Luis Reyes Rivera, Amiri Baraka, Pedro Pietri and others were teaching the people that someone who looked and spoke like them could be literate. The Cafe was such a huge success that they decided to self-publish their poetry. The book, Nuyorican Poetry, would win numerous awards, but it would single-handedly accomplish the task of introducing the mainstream to the Diaspora's poetry. It would not only start a new style of poetry, but it would influence people all around the world, including a young man growing up in Springfield.

I had always seen my mother's Nuyorican book on the shelf, but never read its contents. For many years, I had regarded poetry as nothing more than boring scriptures. One day I decided to read the Nuyorican book when she told me that black and Latino people were writers. I dismissed her comment, brainwashed from an American school system that depicts writers as having a "light" skin tone. When I opened the book, I began to cry. Here were people with Latino names writing poems that referred to my people and experiences. It was beautiful and it would inspire me to begin my own writings and poetry. No longer would I see the "word" as boring. It was now a tool that I could use to empower others and myself. I now had the language to communicate my anger at those who oppressed me and my people.

The word "Amerikkka" was not misspelled when I used it in my writings and poems. It is a direct result of my background in Nuyorican poetry, where words can be altered to better express feelings. Many teachers would try to correct me, assuming that a kid with a Spanish surname could not spell. It only took an explanation of the word and a live reading of my material to make them understand my grammatical intentions. I understood that the original "America" was supposed to be a symbol of power and justice. This was an illusion for me, having lineage from an island that is still a United States' colony, but denied by the government. America represented injustice and racism to me; as it does to most of its black citizens who remember the slave trade. The mere mention of the word would make me laugh at its original hypocritical meaning. I would spell the word in a fashion that would denote no power, and pull the facade off its clean image. Later, I remembered where I learned to spell the word with three "Ks." The Nuyorican book was the source of my new word and its meaning.

The Nuyorican Poetry book did not only inspire me to write, but it also provided a history lesson. My mother never received that book back from me. It sits on my bookshelf now, seized as contraband in the war to educate myself. Maybe one day, the book will sit on my child's shelf so that he or she too can learn the power of words.

Stop it before it begins

Racism, stereotypes and cultural misunderstandings are always tangled with emotions that make it difficult to discuss them, rationally or constructively. Some basic steps are necessary if an honest sharing of feelings is to take place.

Jeff Belizare

The next generation must be willing to admit that we are different from one another. They need to know that, although the most obvious difference is in the color of their skin, there are valid cultural differences of which they can be proud.

This knowledge could spark in them a necessary curiosity about their culture and provide further opportunities to enhance their images of themselves as a people. They need to know that even though there is no inherent goodness or badness in these differences, there are people who believe otherwise and will treat them badly. It is only fair that they know this. Until they learn how to respond to such treatment, their parents should be their first line of defense.

Therefore, it is important that the parents make the next generation feel that they can discuss such experiences with them in an atmosphere free of anxiety, criticism, or punishment.

Black parents must hunger to instill pride and self-esteem in their children.

It is a necessity to be postive — not simply silent — about their child's blackness. In a society that views white as better, cleaner, purer and holier, minority children need to have their self-image actively bolstered in the home. Parents need to focus more on a child's efforts and less on outcomes, to encourage a child to value her or his own ability. The next generation must be taught that different is beautiful. Black, white and Asian are all beautiful.

A generation of black children will be lost if they feel that "being black" is synonymous with failure and a lack of hope for accomplishment in a wide range of areas. The decrease in college enrollment for black males, and the fact that nearly 25 percent of young black males are under the supervision of the criminal justice system, in jail, on parole or on probation, are particular causes for concern.

Parents, teachers and social service agencies must show a greater interest in the gender differences among black children in order to respond effectively to their varying needs, behaviors and expectations. This is the challenge for the future.

Black parents and others must be eternally vigilant in fighting racism in the society in which their children must grow and develop. Being a parent to a black child requires supporting a sense of self-worth and working outside the home, on behalf of your child, for social change to ensure that fairness and equal opportunity exist in every aspect of life.

The Plight of a People: Can we really forget our history?

Have you ever had one of those weekends where you're having a great time, chillin' and parlayin' with your boys and just when you think things can't get any better, they get worse?

I had one of those weekends.

Everything was fine until an acquaintance of mine, who wasn't white, felt that he should comment on one of my past columns. Apparently, he reads my pieces every week, but he had a problem with my views on life.

He asked, "Why are you always talking about the past? We need to forget what happened and move on!"

I was surprised, but I can't say that I was shocked. A number of people have hinted to me that I place too much emphasis on the past. Therefore, this piece is dedicated to all of you who want to just forget about the past and move on.

Don't get me wrong, I'm all for moving on, but you can't move forward without reflecting on what happened in your past.

To these people, I ask: how could you just forget?

Edgar Barros

How could you just forget the pain and suffering dealt to your people by the oppressor? One common cop-out that I hear a lot is, "Well, that was then [white people's] ancestors, not them." I know it wasn't your good buddy Bill who oppressed our people, but it was his people.

If your parents die and leave behind two beach houses in Florida and a car, who inherits the assets?

Now, let's say that they die and leave behind some run down shack in Vermont. Don't you still get that, too?

As with the dirty shack or the beach houses in Florida, white people have to inherit the burden of the sins that their fathers have committed.

For those who like to forget, again I ask you, how can you just forget?

How can you forget your mother being raped? How can you forget your father being burned or whipped to death? How could you forget the day your family was abducted and removed from your home? How could you forget the day the Europeans came to your home and told you that they were taking control?

How could you forget the day your grandmother was arrested for sitting in the front of the bus instead of the back? How could you forget the day your father was killed because he spoke of Black liberation? How could you forget the day your father was hosed down by firemen, attacked by police dogs and beaten, because he wanted equal treatment in the country we helped build? How could you forget the day your neighborhood was bombed, because you were tired of a foreign element ruling your homeland?

How can you forget? We can't forget!

We need to find out more and then we need to pass the knowledge to our kids. Why? We need to know and realize what the oppressor has done to us. If we don't know our past, we are bound to repeat it. So, don't tell me that we need to forget and move on.

You can't move anywhere until you know how you got here.

Along the Color Line: Your voice Learning how to change society

Most Americans will tell you that practical, pragmatic politics is always defined by the "center." How many times have we been told that the effective battleground for determining the future of society is the great American mainstream? That to be a serious factor in politics, we need to work inside the corridors of power, not on the outside. That we need to tailor our political message to be acceptable to contented, complacent subordinates, who drive RVs and watch cable tv. That by becoming a centrist, or even a conservative, we avoid being marginalized, excluded, locked out and isolated on the political periphery.

I respectfully disagree.

Fundamental political change in a democracy almost always comes from the boundaries of society, not from the center. Conscious, dedicated minorities, not the numerical majority, become catalyst for change. And if you build a political movement to stand firmly on the middle ground, you may find that ground collapsing from under your feet.

How do we achieve democratic change within a society? We must, first, understand how that society actually works. Who gets ahead and who doesn't? Who is rewarded and who is punished? Usually, the people we should learn from are those not at the top of society, but at the bottom. Two centuries ago, if we had listened only to Thomas Jefferson, we would have gained some important insights in understanding the contradictory relationship between democracy and slavery.

"We should have to listen to the early feminists and suffragists, such as Susan B. Anthony, Ida B. Wells and Mary Church Terrell, to comprehend how sexism compromised the promise of democracy."

Dr. Manning Marable

But, we would have to listen to the slaves themselves, those who felt the sting of the lash, and those who were bartered and sold on the auction block, to really know the reality of slavery. We would have to learn from black abolitionists such as Frederick Douglass, Sojourner Truth and Harriet Tubman.

Less than a century ago, women were denied the right to vote in this country. Generations of white male politicians justified and rationalized the exclusion of women. We should have to listen to the early feminists and suffragists, such as Susan B. Anthony, Ida B. Wells and Mary Church Terrell, to comprehend how sexism compromised the promise of democracy.

How do you achieve change in a democratic society? By recognizing that in a democracy, the majority can be wrong. Only a generation ago, racial segregation was legal in the United States. There were separate and unequal water fountains, public toilets, hotels, restaurants and churches. Birmingham, Alabama's city council even passed a law making it illegal for blacks and whites to play checkers together! The overwhelming majority of good, middle-class whites in Birmingham supported their racist chief of police, Bull Conner, and their pro-segregationalist governor, George C. Wallace. But they were wrong. Martin Luther King, Jr. did not say let us wait until the majority of southern whites change their minds about segregation. Martin did not counsel patience, or try to moderate his message of "Freedom Now" to "Freedom Someday."

Several years ago Proposition 187 was being debated in California, which proposed discriminatory policies against undocumented immigrants, mostly Latino people. A majority of California's registered voters supported this initiative. We must not be afraid to say that the initiative is wrong. Amendment Two was passed in Colorado, several years ago, which attempted to outlaw local measures protecting the civil rights of lesbians and gays, the same rights that other Americans take for granted.

We should affirm our belief in equal justice for all by saying that the homophobic politics behind that measure were mean-spirited, discriminatory and wrong. We should never be afraid to lose an electoral campaign when we are fighting to affirm democratic rights and equal justice for all.

In a curious way, the conservatives undcrstand this far better than most liberals. You have to be true to your values, because your principles are at the hear of what politics should be. The ideologies of the Far Right, such as Bill Bennett and William Kristol, ground their politics in a set of values. Their only problem is that they've got the wrong set of values.

How do we achieve progressive change? By celebrating our divine discontent with the way things are. Contented, satisfied people rarely want things to change too much. If you want to find out what new directions history is taking our society, don't wallow in the mainstream — stand at the edge, at the boundaries. Listen to the poets and the non- conventional music of young people. Learn from those who have little or nothing to lose. Feel the anxiety of those 40 million Americans today who lack medical insurance. Spend time working in a homeless shelter, or walking a picket line with trade unionists. To be divinely discontent is to want our democratic ideals and our egalitarian hopes to be realized in the world around us. It is to challenge conformity, to push the boundaries of "the way things are" to "the way things should be."

Go and Live Your Dreams, but don't sleep

LIVE YOUR DREAMS
Les Brown
Avon Books

Do you feel worthless and talentless, with nothing more to give? Out of money, out of work, out of hope? Have you walked away from your dreams? What would it keep to keep you going against the odds? Les Brown, motivational speaker, knows that there is greatness within you and he can help you set it free.

"Go after what you want as If your life depended on it. Because it does," Brown says.

Live Your Dreams is Les Brown's personal formula for success and happiness — positively charged thought, guidance and examples.

In chapter format, Brown speaks on subjects titled: You gotta be hungry, The power to change, Wake up and work on your dreams, Live your dreams, Fix and focus, How to overcome baseless fears, The young and goal-less and Be positively charged.

The primary focus of the book is you gotta be hungry. At the onset of the chapter, Calvin Coolidge stresses the importance of pressing on. Nothing can take the place of persistence. Talent will not. The world is full of unsuccessful people with talent. Genius will not; unrewarded genius is almost a proverb. Education alone will not; the world is full of educated derelicts. Persistence and determination alone are omnipotent. Brown points out that life does not always present us with an ideal situation in which to pursue our dreams. That is where hunger comes in. We must motivate ourselves to do what we must do to get on and go on with our lives.

To help build hunger, Brown suggests taking responsibility for your life. Set small goals and accomplish them. Nobody cares as much about you and your dream as you do. Review your goals twice every day. Be focused on achieving them. Reflect on what motivates you. Develop a sense of urgency in your life. Take actions to move you toward your goal. Develop courage. Develop yourself to operating on a massive scale. Develop conviction that you can accomplish your goal. Read inspirational material. Tap into your spiritual awareness and contemplate your mortality. Get acquainted with successful people and ask them what drives them. Develop communication skills. Smile. Try to project a positive image.

It's important that while you pursue your goals you tune out distractions and self-defeating thoughts. With a powerful hunger for your dreams driving you, you will be surprised at the ideas that will come, at the people you will attract and the opportunities that will unfold.

Hunger gives you the courage to take your ideas and run with them. Hunger helps you overcome discouragement; it moves you to use up your talents and your life.

Despite the hunger that you have. Nothing will protect you from the nasty side of life. It will catch you on the blind side, drop you to your needs and choke you. People will betray you. Remember — the most dependable hand you can rely on is the one at the end of your wrist. You can't count on anyone but yourself.

To persevere in hard times, you will have to call on your deepest purpose. Sometimes yours will be a lonely journey. Everyone will not support you. Sometimes the individuals you thought would serve as your encouragers, turn out to be discouragers. The key is to remember not being fearful of the future. Continue working on developing your talents and skills. If you strive to grow continually, you will be part of the future.

Powerful, thought provoking, and well written, Les Brown has done his job as a motivational speaker to perfection. As in his audio tapes and live performances Brown is clear, direct, and full of energy prompting one and all to live their dreams. A definite must read for all. Every aspect of Brown's book enables each and every one of us to become a better scholar, mate, mother, father, teacher and person.

Adam Duritz of the Counting Crows bordered on gloominess at the Saturday concert.

The six man engine that couldn't

Beset by a small crowd, Counting Crows try a little too hard

By Marty Keane
Collegian Staff

COUNTING CROWS / DOG'S EYE VIEW
William D. Mullins Center
Nov. 1

Seeing as rain is used as a metaphor in so many of their songs, it was only fitting that a mini-monsoon greeted the Counting Crows as the year-long "Recovering the Satellites Tour" rolled into the Mullins Center Saturday night for one of their final U.S. dates. It's too bad that a lame crowd, both in size and enthusiasm, dampened an otherwise musically solid (if ultimately unfulfilling) performance.

As a musical group, the Counting Crows are an angst- filled amalgamation that carefully filter the classic rock of Van Morrison and the Band through the post-punk sensibilities of early R.E.M. It was only fitting then that the L.A.-based sextet strolled on stage to the foreboding tranquility of the Mamas and the Papas' "California Dreamin'."

They opened with the title track from last year's impressive Recovering the Satellites (which is a considerably more somber affair than their debut) and the up-tempo "Angels of the Silences," two songs that both skillfully showcase the dichotomy between singer Adam Duritz's tortured, verbose lyrics and the rest of the band's upbeat playing — led by Charlie Gillingham's energetic organ trills and Dan Vickrey's churning guitar squalls.

From there however, the show slid aimlessly downhill and never fully recovered. Still, the band deserves credit for giving it their all and putting a good face on what must have been a disappointing evening for all involved considering the lackluster crowd.

"Rain King," one of the standout tracks off August and Everything After, signalled the show's decline. On record, the song is wrought with vigorous energy, but was instead played live in a laconic style that was top heavy in percussion — not to mention Duritz's gloominess that bordered on overkill. I mean, enough already Adam. Gee it must be really tough when you're dating Courtney Cox and kicking back by bartending at Johnny Depp's Viper Room.

While it was admirable to witness a group not afraid of varying the standard concert formula, it was a nearly fatal miscalculation. It showed that it's solely the Crows' rhythmic thrust that is what keeps them from being rock's version of unflavored jello (read: blandness), not Duritz's one-dimensional lyrics.

Unfortunately, the perfunctory mid-set acoustic excursion provided no respite. "Mr. Jones," the tune that put them on the map, and "Omaha" also were unwisely re-worked and ultimately fell flat. "Mr. Jones" was recast lyrically as Duritz retrospectively pondered the song's original theme of desiring fame and the effects it has had on him, while during the refrain to "Omaha," Duritz sang "Turn your ticket in and get your money back at the door" — clearly a tempting option on this night.

The infectious spunk and vivacity that characterized both these tunes' studio versions were completely sucked out as they quickly turned into grooveless drivel and overly-emotive melancholic mush. All the trappings that helped mold these songs into well-deserved "hits" were brutally absent. These tactics, however admirable, are simply not conducive to putting on a successful arena rock show — especially in front of so few people (the Mullins Center was well short of being half-full Saturday night).

Still, the band managed to rebound and regain some of their earlier momentum. Duritz's solo turn on the excellent "Raining In Baltimore" was a pleasant surprise as he curiously dedicated it to the "Monkey," as was the logical encore of "A Long December" — both were brief but poignant glimpses of raw emotion.

Also impressive was a surprisingly upbeat "Murder of One," "Anna Begins" and the crowd-pleasing set closer "Round Here" in which the audience finally awoke from hibernation to pogo along to the propulsive stomp of drummer Ben Mize and bassist Matt Malley.

Opener Dog's Eye View played a 45-minute set of generic alternative rock that was neither engaging nor memorable.

Overall, the concert fell short — sinking into blandness.

Clearing up the myths about soap operas

Jacob Fanning's Soap Chat

Hello, my fellow soap fans. Today I want to talk about a little thing called R-E-S-P-E-C-T, respect for the genre and for the people who watch. I recently had an argument with a neighbor of mine in which he criticized (bashed is probably more accurate) soaps as being "cheesy and ridiculous" or something to that effect. You can imagine how I reacted to that. I took a few deep breaths...and then blew up at him. I was sick and tired of hearing people who haven't even watched a soap in its entirety (trust me, he hasn't) criticizing them and further more — me — for watching them. He comes in my room, watches the show for five minutes and then has the gall to insult the entire genre (ah, ignorance is bliss!). In those short five minutes, he's already come to the conclusion that soap operas "suck," an opinion that lacks any merit, in my opinion, since he hasn't actually seen one. I could understand, maybe even agree, with his argument had he limited his criticisms to the one scene but to make a sweeping generalization about the entire industry based on a few short segments...just plain ignorance.

I don't know what's so threatening, especially among men, about soap operas that they feel the need to attack them so vigorously. Do they feel as though acknowledging a possible interest in them would be a threat to their masculinity (since its audience is largely comprised of females and it has always been viewed as a "feminine" pastime)? Well, me and the thousands of closet male soap opera fans around the country are here to tell you that that's a bunch of bs. And for those of you who have told me that you "don't watch that crap" yet watch shows like "90210" and "Party of Five"... sorry to burst your bubbles, darlings, but those are soaps!

Let's deal with some of the most frequent complaints that the skeptics harp on:

"What bad acting!" — Let me give you a little insight; daytime actors generally get the script for the following day's show the day before taping, which means they only have 24 hours (that is if they don't sleep or eat) to memorize their lines. They also have to wrap up the show by the end of the day which leaves little room for mistakes. They don't have the luxury of calling it a day early and resuming tomorrow, like most weekly shows. Furthermore, daytime actors don't have the entire week to memorize their lines and perfect their strategy, like the actors of weekly dramas, sitcoms, etc. It's exactly for this reason that daytime has been regarded (among the acting community) as an extremely challenging medium. Just ask Leslie Horan (Miranda, "GH") who faltered in her first daytime role despite her previous success in several made-for-TV movies. "It's extremely demanding," she had been quoted as saying in a Soap Opera Digest article shortly before her departure. That's why the acting can seem a bit disappointing in comparison to weekly dramas like "E.R." It takes twice the actor to pull off an extremely convincing and well performed scene in daytime.

"Look at the ridiculous sets and production values (like the recent "Days Of Our Lives jungle adventure)." — The daytime soaps also have a very limited budget with which to work with and most of it is spent on the cast of 20 or so. They do the best they can with the little they have. Trying to get money out of the execs is probably like trying to pull teeth. The budget for a popular sitcom or drama is twice that of your average soap opera.

I challenge all of you skeptics to watch a soap like "General Hospital" or "Guiding Light" (two of the best in the field) on a Friday and tell me that you find nothing worthwhile or appealing about them...or are you afraid you might actually get hooked (my roommate can relate). In any case, please don't come up to me and insult the genre that I love without at least watching an episode.

Now, for a little news...

• Richard Culliton (ex-"GH" head scribe) will be replacing Michael Malone as "Another World's" head writer. Let's hope he's learned something from his botched attempt at "General Hospital." He left a lot to be desired there!

• James E. Reily, "Days'" head writer, aired his last script two weeks ago. He's leaving the show to head up a new NBC soap (in development) that is expected to hit the airwaves two years from now. Sally Sussman Morina will be picking up the slack.

Sink or Swim?

Swim:

• Friday's episode of "GH." It doesn't get any better than this.

• Crystal Carson's (Julia) return to "GH." It's so good to see you again... too bad you're only here for a short stint (hint, hint ABC)

• Dinah and Cassie's catfight on "Guiding Light."

Sink:

• Dimitri on "All My Children," threatening Skye's life and all...hope the SOB rots.

• Randy Spelling on "Sunset Beach"...how about a few acting classes, buddy. It's a good thing your Dad's a believer in nepotism! Little bit of something...Thought I'd include a few previews for this week:

Smith Theater shines in new production of Lapin, Lapin

By Kelly Parent
Collegian Correspondent

LAPIN, LAPIN
Hallie Flanagan Studio Theatre
Oct. 31

NORTHAMPTON — The place is Paris, France; the time is the future — filled with an odd mix of urban terrorists, extraterrestrials, grunge rockers, war, poverty and of course, television media.

This weekend, the Smith College Theatre Department brought Lapin, Lapin to the stage. The play was written by acclaimed screenwriter and director, Coline Serreau, who wrote Three Men and a Cradle — later made into the popular movie, Three Men and a Baby.

Lapin, Lapin was performed at French farce telling the story of a post-mod, but somewhat neurotic, family and their trials and tribulations of life. You don't know whether to laugh or to cry at their situations as they deal with issues of divorce, unemployment, family relationships, terrorism and the youngest daughter's decision to go back to outer space and leave her earth family.

Act I takes place in the tiny apartment of a family of four, which soon becomes a family of nine as the other daughters come back to stay. Some of the new arrivals include a boyfriend, and an eccentric, half-deaf neighbor who is lonely and wants some company. It's a wonder how they fit all the people into the apartment — let alone feed all the out-of- work visitors.

Mama, played by Peach Pittenger, tries to deal with the fact that her five daughters are not what she wanted them to be when two of them get arrested for being terrorists, one gets divorced and one leaves her fiancé at the altar. Finally, Lapin, the youngest daughter, a closet extraterrestrial, is expelled from school. Add to the mix, the husband gets laid off.

Act II takes place in the office of the soldiers who arrest the oldest daughter, Beberte, for terrorism. Working together as a family along with the eccentric neighbor, Madame Duperri, they plan a mad-capped escape for Beberte, only to discover more twists with the story. When Madame Duperri locates her long lost son, the final revenge comes of turning all the soldiers into women to end the war.

The actors' excellent performances made the play engaging, especially Pittenger, who asked the audience to "take seven seconds to cry inside for her" in one of her monologues as she dealt with the craziness of her family as well as the comic performance of Madame Duperri played admirably by Jessica Horn.

All in all, depressing as the premise may seem, Lapin, Lapin had the audience laughing at the humor inherent in the crazy twists and turns in the plot.

captain Chris Kelleher from behind early in the second period. BU scored 28 seconds into the resulting power play, and had another goal disallowed seconds after. But UMass clamped down and refused to let the momentum sway in the Terriers favor. The Minutemen killed off the final four minutes of BU's man advantage and escaped what could have been a tragic blow to the game.

Just when the Terrier faithfuls expected UMass to bow down to the reigning Hockey East champions, UMass knotted up the score.

Lovell received a pass at the left point, faked a slapshot, moved in about twenty feet from Noble and blasted the puck into the left corner of the net.

The score catapulted the Minutemen into the third period, when down, 4–2, a shot that ricocheted off the chest of Chris Fawcett into the net was disallowed. Mallen felt the apparent goal, with just under four minutes to play, could have changed the outcome of the game.

"The referee made the call and you can't cry about it," Mallen said. "But it was a turning point in the game."

Yesterday, a small crowd at the Mullins Center hardly mirrored the raucous Walter Brown Arena atmosphere, when UMass took on Boston College.

Early on, the play was sloppy and uneven on both sides of the ice. Not until midway through the second frame, when BC scored on a sparkling touch pass off Marty Reasoner's stick, did the Minutemen display the brand of hockey they're capable of playing.

A vicious, physical scramble in front of Eagles goaltender Andy McLaughlin came up empty in the final stages of the second period, but carried over into the opening moments of the final period. One minute and 54 seconds in, a Dan Juden rush left the puck in front of the net and McLaughlin vulnerable. Brad Norton pounced on it, tying the contest at 1–1.

Unfortunately, a solid third period effort by the Eagles put two additional goals on the scoreboard, handing the Minutemen their third loss in as many games this season. However, the Eagles had to fight for the win. And Mallen and UMass left the ice knowing they had sent a message to the top echelon of Hockey East.

upended the Minutewomen in four sets, 15– 12, 14–16, 15–12, 15–6.

Despite the loss, four UMass players registered double– doubles on the night, including Nolan, who knocked down 12 kills to go along with her 23 digs. Meyers had 18 kills, 12 digs and four blocks.

"Our lack of intensity and desire killed us tonight and that's what we built our foundation on," Kenny said. "I thought Sarah Watters played better offensively, but that's about it for pluses."

It should be pretty clear where this team's going to be in late November when UMass returns to the Cage for the season finale. UMass takes on four conference rivals in consecutive weekends on the road, each of whom defeated the Minutewomen earlier this season.

"We have to play all out and play like every match is a must–win because it is," said Watters. "We want to be playing over Thanksgiving in the A–10's and to do that, everybody's going to have to step it up."

she netted the only goal of the contest at 23:42.

UMass was not able to convert on any of its eight corner opportunities. The Minutewomen defense held strong, only allowing St. Joe's one corner, and stifling the Hawks on that chance.

Tucker stopped three shots in her fourth shutout of the year, and Hawk goalie Andreana Mevoli made 10 saves.

UMass will return to action this weekend, when the Minutewomen will face Temple in an A–10 tournament semifinal. The Minutewomen have won five of the league tournaments in the 1990s, including last year, when UMass beat Rhode Island, 6–0, in the finals at St. Joe's.

For the first time, the winner of the tournament will receive an automatic bid to the NCAA tournament. In previous years, the A–10 winner has had to win a play–in game to advance to the 12–team national field. Last year, UMass beat Ball State of the Mid–America Conference in the play–in. The Ivy League also received an automatic bid this year.

utes of the game, we lost total control defensively, and we quit out there."

The second half started with a Kate Webb blast from 10 yards out, which beat Tiger goalkeeper Suzanne Putnam low to her left, cutting the lead to 4–2. The Minutewomen continued to pressure the Clemson defense throughout the half, culminating in an Emma Kurowski goal at 73:20. Lecot crossed the ball from the right flank and the deflection fell at Kurowski's feet. The sophomore forward calmed down the loose ball and kicked the ball to the right of Putnam. The 4–3 game almost became a tie with Bartlett's rush in the final minute, but the Tiger defense was able to knock the ball out of the penalty area to preserve the tight victory.

Georgia 1, UMass 0

Georgia shut the Minutewomen out for the first time all season yesterday in Athens. Bulldog forward Bentley Bickerstaff scored the game–winner in the 88th minute to push the unranked Bulldogs past UMass. The Minutewomen now await the opening round of the A–10 tournament, which kicks off Friday. UMass is the No. 1 seed.

Hofstra built a 24–0 halftime lead on the strength of a controlled passing game that marched them up and down the field. Carmazzi was 21–of–30 for 232 yards at halftime. They led by as much as 41–0 before UMass scored a couple late touchdowns for the 51–13 final.

The numbers tell the story of this season. Six of the seven UMass losses have been by more than 10 points. Saturday's blowout was the third time the Minutemen have lost by more than 30 points. The 51–13 final was the worst home loss in 10 years, surpassing the worst home loss of the Hodges era set only last week against Delaware. If the Minutemen can't win one of the two final games, they will be the first team in the 118 year history of Massachusetts football to lose nine games.

Senior quarterback Anthony Catterton went 10–of–28 for 82 yards and two touchdowns, but tied a school record with five interceptions. Tight end Kerry Taylor caught both TDs, and now has eight touchdowns in only 22 career receptions. Freshman Marcel Shipp broke off his first 100–yard game, with 104 yards on 16 carries.

Massachusetts loses to Dukes, beats Bonnies

YVONNE YANG / COLLEGIAN

The UMass volleyball team continued its string of splitting matches by going 1–1 yet again this weekend.

By Bratt Mauser
Collegian Staff

Once again, it was the tale of two matches for the Massachusetts volleyball team. This weekend, UMass had a chance to build their confidence. Coming in, they were tied for fifth place in the conference, only a game behind fourth place Virginia Tech.

This weekend, the Minutewomen (12–13, 7–7 in the A–10) split their two match set at the Curry Hicks Cage, first dropping a 3–1 decision to Duquesne, whom they were knotted with, then routing the Bonnies of St. Bonaventure 3– 0 on Saturday.

On Saturday, the Minutewomen showed everybody what we may see more of in the future. Pure domination. The Minutewomen limited the opposition to only 10 points on their way to a 15–2, 15–5, 15–3 blowout at the Cage.

It was a mismatch from the beginning. UMass was taking on a St. Bonaventure team that hadn't picked up a victory yet in conference and had only four wins overall on the season.

Sophomore outside hitter Sarah Watters stepped into the spotlight, collecting 10 kills on the night, the only double digit kill total for the match. As a team, the Minutewomen hit a solid .280 on the attack and held the Bonnies to a combined .024 attack percentage.

"We moved the ball around very well with our hitters and our transition on free balls was very good," said Coach Bonnie Kenny after the convincing win, "but we have to learn to do that when it's tough, not just when it's easy."

Sophomore middle blocker Jill Meyers had a great all– around performance, picking up seven kills, six digs and six blocks. Freshman setter Jennifer Drennan led the Minutewomen in assists and digs, with 22 and 10, respectively.

The win put a bandage on a five match losing streak at home against Atlantic Ten opponents. It also marked the most lopsided victory for the Minutewomen since yielding only four points in a match against LaSalle last year at Curry Hicks.

In the loss to Duquesne, senior outside hitter Lesley Nolan became UMass' career leader in digs with 1,412, surpassing former Minutewoman Dionne Nash. But the UMass squad couldn't pull out what was a very evenly contested match. The Lady Dukes

UM field hockey named No. 2 seed

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

The West Chester field hockey team assured itself the No. 1 seed in the Atlantic 10 tournament with a 1–0 win over Massachusetts Friday. The Minutewomen receive the No. 2 seed for the tourney, which they will host beginning Saturday.

Golden Ram goaltender Heather Vearling made all the difference in the contest, which pitted the league's two undefeated teams against each other. Vearling came up with 24 saves to secure the win for West Chester (14–3, 5–0 A– 10).

The early game trouble that has hampered the Minutewomen in several games this season was again a major factor, as Mary Melnick scored the game's lone goal just 53 seconds in.

An added factor for UMass was that the game was played on grass, a surface the Minutewomen have only played on once since the end of last season. UMass coach Patty Shea said earlier last week, though, that playing on grass would not serve as an excuse for the Minutewomen.

However, even after recovering from the early score and adjusting to the different surface to dominate the field for the remainder of the game, the Minutewomen could not get the ball past Vearling. UMass ended with 19 penalty corners to West Chester's seven and outshot the Golden Rams, 24– 10.

UMass goalie Zowie Tucker finished with eight saves.

The Minutewomen rebounded from their loss and ended their regular season with a win at St. Joseph's yesterday, 1– 0.

The weekend split gives UMass an 11–9 record — 4–1 in conference play — to finish the season.

Junior midfielder Vicky Browne provided all the firepower the Minutewomen needed, as

Lovell and Norton not enough for Massachusetts

UM shows it can play with the best

By Corey Peter Goodman
Collegian Staff

BOSTON — Massachusetts hockey coach Joe Mallen had said it all along.

Despite being picked to finish eighth in Hockey East, Mallen claimed his Minutemen could compete with anyone in the conference on any given night.

This weekend UMass proved him right, surprising a pair of Hockey East giants with two impressive showings though in losing efforts. Friday night UMass fell to No. 3 Boston University, 5–2, and Sunday afternoon the Minutemen fell to No. 9 Boston College, 3–1.

UMass wasn't greeted fondly at BU's Walter Brown Arena. The 3,467 crazed fans — mostly students dressed in Halloween costumes — were outwardly stunned by a relentless Minutemen attack that struck 42 seconds into the contest when co–captain Tim Lovell stuffed the puck past Terrier netminder Tom Noble.

The UMass attack didn't let up during the remainder of the first session, creating traffic in front of Noble and exposing a number of scoring opportunities.

The Minutemen defense was just as successful in stifling the high–flying Terrier attack. Clogging up the blue line and preventing the long ball pass, UMass was able to keep the puck in the BU zone the majority of the evening.

Lovell, in addition to scoring both Minutemen goals, played a key role in UMass' defensive scheme, shutting down BU's all–American Chris Drury. The senior figured in on only one of the Terriers five goals.

When BU slithered past UMass' back line, Brian Regan was there. The senior goaltender came up with a handful of sprawling saves that kept UMass in striking range of the Terriers. For the evening, Regan stoned 23 Terrier shots.

UMass had to play without the services of junior, first– liner Steve MacKinnon who received a 5–minute major and a controversial game misconduct penalty for hitting BU co–

The Massachusetts hockey team faced off against a pair of the best collegiate teams in the country over the weekend.

In the past, a weekend consisting of a Friday night tussle with No. 2 Boston University in Boston and a Sunday matinee affair with No. 9 Boston College at the Mullins Center would have offered no hope for the Minuteman program that continues to build from their 1993 reinstatement.

UMass	2

UMass coach Joe Mallen's troops — revamped by the addition of Tim Lovell and an HE–tested senior defensive corps — held Terriers' superstar Chris Drury without a goal and bullied the Eagles into 24 penalty minutes.

Despite the obvious marked improvement in competitiveness, the Minutemen lost both games, 5–2 and 3– 1 respectively.

"They were pretty evenly played games," said Mallen of his team which fell to 0–3 (0–3 Hockey East) after the BC loss. "[BC] was opportunistic on a couple of chances. It seems like we haven't got a bounce all season."

Eagle left winger Jamie O'Leary got the deciding bounce in the middle of the third period in a back–and–forth UMass– BC contest.

The Minuteman defense couldn't clear the puck out of the zone, and the Eagles (3–1, 1–1 HE) took possession at the blue line. Ken Hemenway rifled a shot from the point that Brian Regan initially stopped, but could not control. A scram ensued in front of the UMass crease and O'Leary poked the loose puck under Regan's right pad at 7:39 to break a 1–1 tie.

"The puck was just laying there," O'Leary said. "I slapped at it... I don't even know how it went in."

O'Leary iced the game less than two minutes later with a wide–open slap shot from 20 feet out.

"He's a very skilled player," BC coach Jerry York said. "He hasn't quite hit his stride at BC; I'd like to see him have a big senior year."

A player Mallen would like to see have a big senior year is defenseman Brad Norton who scored the only UMass goal 1:54 into the third period.

The Minutemen were on the power play and Dan Juden started a rush down the middle of the ice. Juden rifled a wrist shot that rebounded hard off BC goalie Andy McLaughlin's pad. Norton, trailing the play, put the biscuit in the basket glove side high to temporarily tie the contest, 1–1.

"Norton has developed into one of the premier players in the conference," York said. "His puck handling gave us fits today."

Lovell was held scoreless on the afternoon. In fact, Norton's goal (assisted by Juden and Matt Smith) was the first UMass score of the season he wasn't involved in.

It took Lovell only 42 seconds to light the lamp against BU (3–0, 1–0 HE) and give the Minutemen a 1–0 lead. He scored the other UMass goal in the second period to grab a short 2–1 advantage, but the perennial powerhouse Terriers were too strong for the Minutemen.

Drury, whom Lovell shut down, notched his only point at 12:52 in the second on the power play with an assist to Mike Sylvia whose second goal of the game made the score 3–2

Hofstra blows out Massachusetts

51–13 home loss is worst in 10 years for UMass

By Luke Meredith
Collegian Staff

When Hofstra tailback Vaughn Sanders scampered 29 yards into the endzone to give the Flying Dutchmen a 41–0 lead with 20 minutes of football left to play, you could see in their eyes.

It had been coming for weeks, brewed in demoralizing defeats to Villanova, Maine and last week's 40–9 disaster against Delaware. After three quarters of missed opportunities, a seemingly helpless defense and an offense that had failed to score against a Hofstra unit ranked 98th in the country, the despondent stares of this extremely young Massachusetts football team told the realization of a fact that had been whispered around Amherst since Richmond thumped the squad to open the season on Aug. 30.

In the gloomy, rain swept haze of McGuirk Stadium on Saturday, Massachusetts hit rock bottom. And the whispers? Well, rest easy, because it would be almost impossible to get any worse than it is now.

Losing to Hofstra at home wasn't shocking. The Flying Dutchmen are now 7–2, and 4–1 against A–10 opponents, a conference this small independent New York school has openly lobbied to join. It was the way it happened, a 51–13 blowout in the wind swept rainy turf of Warren McGuirk Stadium, in a game in which both the offense and the defense completely broke down, that has left the Minutemen (2–7, 1–5 A–10) wondering how they can salvage this season.

"One of the scarier things that can happen to a football team is that they learn to accept losing," UMass head coach Mike Hodges said. "I don't ever want them to do that, because once you accept losing... then you might as well stop competing. I don't think that's happened to [the Minutemen]...Winning's a habit, but so is losing, and we need to figure out how to break out of it."

Though Saturday's game was the first ever between Massachusetts and Hofstra, there were two things everyone, from the players, coaches, fans and probably even the cheerleaders, could bank on. One, you were going to get wet, (the steady rain kept the crowd at 2,510, by far the smallest crowd in recent memory). Two, Hofstra was going to throw the football on almost every down. The Flying Dutchmen employed that time–honored, late 80s chestnut of an offense known as the run and shoot, which emphasizes no huddle and short, quick passes. Hodges even said before the game that he expected Hofstra to "get off the bus throwing the football."

And throw they did. Hofstra quarterback Giovanni Carmazzi finished 25–of–37 for 340 yards and a touchdown in less than three quarters, breaking school records for yardage and TDs in the process. The Flying Dutchmen had six receivers catch three or more passes, led by Wayne Yearwood's eight catches for 133 yards.

Women's soccer falls to Clemson, 4-3

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

ATHENS, Ga.— No one is perfect.

But if you found success at a rate of, say 75 percent, then that would be considered a good thing.

Well, for 73 minutes of the No. 13 Massachusetts women's soccer team's 4–3 loss to No. 20 Clemson last Friday afternoon, the Minutewomen (15–3) controlled the pace of the game. UMass had quality scoring opportunities from junior Sophie Lecot and freshman Kara Green, and the Tigers defense was left on their heels reaching for a solution in the first half.

UMass	3

"I thought we did really well. But, bottom line, we had some great scoring chances, but they did better putting theirs away than we did ours."

-Jim Rudy

But in a 17 minute span in the first half, Clemson took their three–pronged offense, led by Jenny Crawford's three goals and obliterated the Minutewomen's disheveled midfield for four unanswered goals. After an early 1–0 lead at the 8:02 mark of the game on sophomore Tarah Tokarchik's goal, UMass lost control of the flow of the game and the Tigers made their winning scoring run.

A strong second half brought the Minutewomen back into the game, but freshman Brooke Bartlett's scoring opportunity in the final minute didn't find the net and Clemson held on for the close 4–3 win.

UMass has failed to solidify their national ranking against a team that has been as high as No. 10 in the country, and who beat No. 4 Virginia last weekend. Reality says the Minutewomen should get into the NCAA tournament, which kicks off in two weeks, but they now have to win the A–10 tournament to assure themselves of a possible home berth in the first round.

For UMass head coach Jim Rudy, he liked what he saw from his team for 73 minutes, but not that fateful 17 minute span where Clemson put it away.

"I thought we did really well," Rudy said. "But, bottom line, we had some great scoring chances, but they did better putting theirs away than we did ours. For 17 min-

Prince Harry and father travel to Africa

DUKUDUKU, South Africa (AP) — Britain's 13-year-old prince watched shyly yesterday as adolescent girls performed a Zulu dance during a visit with his father to a rural high school in South Africa.

Prince Harry's trip to Africa marked his first public activity since the funeral of his mother, Princess Diana, who died in a car crash in Paris on Aug. 31.

The journey also fulfilled one of Diana's wishes, for her sons to see Africa. Diana's brother, Earl Spencer, lives in Cape Town, but officials did not say if Harry visited his uncle.

At Ubuhlebemveio High School in KwaZulu-Natal province, Charles and Harry watched the bare-breasted girls, wearing black and white string skirts, perform the traditional dance.

Harry talked quietly to his father during the performance. When a teacher spoke to Harry, he only smiled. He walked shyly with his left thumb in his pocket, scratching the soil with his foot. Charles arrived in southern Africa on Wednesday to begin a three-nation tour. While Charles visited Swaziland and Lesotho, Harry went on safari in Botswana with a school friend and his former nanny, Tiggy Legge-Bourke.

Dow Jones climbs to third largest gain

NEW YORK (AP) — Apparently putting last week's wild and scary ride behind it, the Dow Jones industrial average soared yesterday to its third-biggest point gain ever, reflecting a recovery in Asian markets and optimism about the U.S. economy.

The Dow jumped 232.31 points to finish at 7,674.39, according to preliminary numbers. The rebound came just a week after the Dow plummeted a record 554 points because of a panicky selloff in Hong Kong and elsewhere in Asia, Europe and Latin America.

Nearly 450 million shares had changed hands by late Monday afternoon on the New York Stock Exchange — a more typical level after the frantic 1.2 billion shares of last Tuesday.

"The markets have now stabilized and are settling down to another run for the records," said Ned Riley, chief investment officer at the Bank of Boston. He said investors are starting to feel the worst might be behind them.

Helping ease fears was a sharp 6 percent gain yesterday on the key Hong Kong stock market and recoveries in other Asian and European markets as well.

Asian markets were bolstered by a $33 billion rescue package hurriedly put together late last week for Indonesia. It was the second-largest ever fashioned by the International Monetary Fund. The biggest, $50 bil-

SGA Senator Alvarez recomends a disintergration of ALANA Caucus

By Victoria Groves
Collegian Staff

Newly elected senator Carlos Alvarez (Central Residential Area at large) has submitted a motion to eliminate senatorial appointments including the ALANA (Asian, Latin American, Native American, African American) Caucus and Area Government from the Student Government Association (SGA) undergraduate student Senate at the University of Massachusetts.

"The current system discriminates against the population of the University not represented by the ALANA Caucus," wrote Alvarez, who himself identifies with the Latino community.

"Senator positions should be reserved to people through elections. Democracy rests on elections, and if 13 percent of the senate can not be touched because it's reserved to ALANA, it is undermined," Alvarez said.

According to senate speaker Peter Kilbourne, the motion may come up at this Wednesday's Senate meeting despite the fact that it has not gone through committee.

"Any senator can move to suspend the rules and put something new on the agenda and then rearrange it," said Kilbourne.

"The reason we have committees is to give recommendations," Kilbourne said.

Committees for the senate have not been formed yet.

Chief Legal Counsel to SGA and Director of Student Legal Services Charles Dimare reviews all motions to make sure form and content being referred to in the constitution is correct.

After his approval, the Chief Justice is also required to approve of the motion. Only then can a motion be brought to the Senate and voted on.

Alvarez, a freshman, said he was approached by members of ALANA about becoming involved.

"I got here and was approached by ALANA; I totally respect them... but the appointment process was brought to my attention. I figured one of the first things I would do [as a senator] was to get this in early so I know it will be debated," Alvarez said.

Included in Alvarez's motion is the elimination of area government appointed senatorial seats.

"Currently elected senators–at–large already represent their areas, and the further appointment of another senator by the area governments creates a non–democratic loophole through which area governments may inflict their views while ignoring the concerns and ideas of their respective populations," Alvarez wrote.

According to the SGA Constitution, this motion would be an amendment and would require a two–thirds vote of the Senate membership in attendance at a scheduled meeting, and a majority vote of the SGA membership through an Action Referendum.

An Action Referendum is a question that would appear on a ballot to be voted on by the entire undergraduate community.

Malwin Davila, ALANA chairperson, could not be reached for comment.

University celebrates Puerto Rican heritage

By Christine Soh
Collegian Staff

"The Human Rights Struggle of Puerto Rican Political Prisoners," "Taking it Back to La Comunidad," "Creaciones Indigenas," and the climactic "Voices for the Voiceless" are the four main events that will comprise Puerto Rican Heritage Week.

The first of these four events will focus on Puerto Rican political prisoners. Serving as a day of information and commentary, the two events scheduled to occur today will be "an opportunity to open your eyes," according to Melissa Hernandez, Chairperson of Boricuas Unidos, the Puerto Rican Student Organization at the University of Massachusetts.

"People don't know about political prisoners in general. This is a good way to let people know what's out there," Hernandez said. "People are fighting for you, fighting for your rights."

Among today's events will be an exhibit on the Campus Center concourse providing biographical and background information on the current Puerto Rican prisoners.

Also, the video, Cada Guaraguao Tiene Su Pitirre will be shown from 6 to 9 p.m. in the Campus Center, room 168c. It is narrated by Puerto Rican writer and poet Pirri Thomas and serves as an adequate introduction to the position of political prisoners, particularly those from Puerto Rico.

The video will be followed by a lecture and discussion facilitated by representatives of the National Committee to Free Puerto Rican Prisoners of War and Political Prisoners, a New York based organization.

Nov. 5 will be devoted to a day of community service. "Taking it back to La Comunidad" will bring the members of Boricuas Unidos to a shelter for women and children in Northampton.

Thursday will be an opportunity to learn about Puerto Rican art. On this day, the members of Boricuas Unidos will partake in a workshop facilitated by Dr. Ana R. Rivera, in the Student Union.

Friday night's event, "Voices for the Voiceless," will bring Puerto Rican Heritage week to a monumental close.

"It's history being made," said Jaime "Shaggy" Flores, a member of Boricuas Unidos and also one of the poets performing in the event. "Imagine the Harlem Renaissance coming to the Five College area."

Subtitled, "Spoken Word From Underground Griots," this historic evening will bring together 15 renowned black and Latino poets. Used to describe underground poets, the word "griot" also describes the first poets, or the ancient storytellers of Africa.

Among the list of griots performing are Luis Reyes Rivera and Sandra Maria Esteves, two Nuyorican poets who have influenced multitudes of writers.

The theme of the evening, present in the title "Voices for the Voiceless," comes from the words of political prisoner, Mumia Abu Jamal, whose case is becoming one of the more popular examples of what it means to be a U.S. political prisoner. The theme, voices for the voiceless, is also a universal notion that the peoples of black and Latino heritage, and ALANA peoples in general, have been deemed voiceless by a white hegemony. This event therefore represents the assertion of a voice through the written word.

Other poets will include Tish Benson, Tony Medina, Caridad De La Cruz, Lydia Okuturo, members of the Darkside Collective, and several more.

The event is being produced in conjunction with other UMass sponsors and five-college student organizations. It will take place on Friday night from 6 to 10:30 p.m. at Chapin Auditorium, Mount Holyoke College. Hors d'oeuvres will be served and the poets will be selling and signing their books and CDs.

Court upholds Prop. 209

By Richard Carelli
Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C.— The Supreme Court let stand California's groundbreaking Proposition 209, a ban on race and gender preference in hiring and school admission. Affirmative action foes predicted other states now will follow California's lead.

Acting without comment yesterday, the nation's highest court rejected a challenge to the California measure by a coalition of civil rights groups.

The measure, an amendment to the state constitution, says the state and local governments cannot "discriminate against or grant preferential treatment to any individual or group on the basis of race, sex, color, ethnicity or national origin."

Lower courts had said the anti–affirmative action measure violated no one's constitutional rights and was a neutral way to promote equality. But its opponents contended the measure relegated racial minorities and women to the status of second-class citizens in California.

The Supreme Court's action was not a decision and set no national precedent. It merely left in place the lower court rulings. But the action could encourage voters in other states to adopt similar measures.

"I hope and believe other states will follow suit," said Clint Bolick of the Institute for Justice. "The court's [action] is a further repudiation of the arguments made by the Clinton administration and its allies."

He said an anti–affirmative action drive is under way in Washington state. In Houston, a ballot initiative to be voted on Tuesday would do away with affirmative action in the

FCC panel to investigate ads

By Jeannine Aversa
Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The government should look into TV advertising of whiskey and other liquors, the new chairman of the Federal Communications Commission said yesterday. The previous FCC deadlocked on the issue in July.

Bill Kennard discussed the issue with reporters on his first day on the job as chairman of the Federal Communications Commission. President Clinton asked the FCC in April to conduct such an inquiry into TV liquor ads, but the old panel rejected the proposal by a 2-2 vote.

"I have talked to people on both sides of the issue, and not one person has told me that more distilled liquor advertising is a good thing for the country," Kennard said.

"I believe that we ought to have this debate," Kennard said. "It is too important an issue for America to put it in the closet and say that government can't do anything about it."

Kennard did not say whether he has the three votes necessary on the five-member panel to move forward on a liquor ad inquiry, but said he intends over the next few weeks to talk to his new colleagues about the

After 15 months without a contract, graduate students continue negotiation process

By Julie Siegal
Collegian Staff

While bargaining for a new contract with the University of Massachusetts administration, the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) has completed their two–week long letter–writing campaign.

More than 25 groups of graduate students from various academic departments and organizations on campus marched with letters in hand to Chancellor David K. Scott's office from Oct. 15–31, expressing their concerns about acquiring a new contract.

Although the letter–writing campaign has lasted two weeks, GEO's general contract bargaining campaign, STOMP (Strategy to Organize Membership Participation) has been a 20–month process. They have also been working without a new contract for 15 months.

The significant issues that remain on the bargaining table are wages, health care, child care and education access.

STOMP letter–writing campaign

Graduate student employees from campus–wide academic departments and various organizations have joined together to aid GEO in their battle against the UMass administration.

From the computer science and history departments, to the Stonewall Center and Resident Directors (RDs) in Housing Services, many graduate students have submitted letters to Chancellor Scott expressing their concerns about the lengthy contract negotiations.

"Your actions make it clear that signing a contract with the graduate student employees is not a priority for the administrators of the university," graduate student employees of the Stonewall Center wrote in their letter to Chancellor Scott.

"Your lackadaisical approach to the signing of a contract with GEO and the issues that we have brought to the negotiating table is appalling. It is a disservice to the students of the University and the people of Massachusetts who have entrusted you with the job of running an educational institution," the letter continued.

The lack of a new contract interferes with the graduate students' productiveness as university employees, graduate students from the economics department said.

"The present low levels of wages combined with the uncertainty regarding the new contract create an atmosphere of distrust between the graduate employees and the administration," graduate student employees from the economics department wrote in their letter to Scott.

"Ultimately, the situation reduces our motivation and effectiveness as TAs [Teaching Assistants] and RAs [Research Assistants] in the economics department."

Graduate student employees from the history department say they hope negotiations get settled quickly so they can return to "an environment of fairness."

"Unlike the administration, our elected representatives do not get paid to be at the bargaining table and we support their dedication," wrote the graduate student employees from the history department.

"Therefore, we urge you to settle the current contract promptly and equitably. The prolongation of this conflict has fostered an atmosphere hostile to learning. With a settlement, our university can once again be a place where all can educate and learn in an environment of fairness."

GEO's proposals

GEO proposed an increased wage plan to compete with salaries at other academic institutions. The average graduate student salary at UMass is far less than those at other large state universities, GEO said.

The minimum TA salary at UMass is $6,940 compared to $12,000–13,000 at the University of Connecticut. The poverty level for one person in Massachusetts in $7,740 a year, which is below most graduate students salaries.

For health care, GEO is seeking dental and optical care coverage, coverage for those with dependents between 18 and 21 and increased options for health care coverage, other than University Health Services (UHS), according to the Oct. 12 issue of "Steal this Newsletter," GEOs newsletter at UMass.

"We continue to hear horror stories about the care at UHS and improvements to health care ranked highest on our pre– bargaining surveys [after wages]," wrote Tom Taffee in the newsletter.

GEO is also seeking increased funding for child care vouchers for parents and the establishment of a flexible child care center, the newsletter said. GEO has identified child care space in the Immanuel Lutheran Church, a half block from UMass, which has vacant space and has already been used for an after school center.

For educational access, GEO said it hopes for increased funds for the recruitment and retention of students of color, poor and working students, first generation college students, single parents and international students in need, according to

Middle East talks off to slow start

By Barry Schweid
Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C.— A new round of negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians got off to a slow start yesterday as U.S. mediators complained that the delegation sent by Yasser Arafat lacked expertise in some areas.

The Palestinian leader sent three of his most senior deputies to Washington, but not the backup specialists that State Department spokesman James P. Rubin said were needed to deal with setting up a Palestinian airport and seaport, an industrial zone and a corridor for traveling between the West Bank and Gaza.

Arafat apparently intended to underscore that he wanted the talks mediated by Secretary of State Madeleine Albright and U.S. envoy Dennis Ross to concentrate on his demand for a substantial Israeli pullback on the West Bank.

But Rubin said "we are concerned" that Palestinian specialists were not included in the delegation. He said that "without them we won't be able to make any progress" on the four issues.

The response from Arafat's headquarters was chilly.

Marwan Kanafani, an adviser to the Palestinian leader, said the negotiators sent to Washington "are more than experts" on all issues on Albright's agenda. "If there is a positive development on these basic issues, I think Arafat is prepared to dispatch a private plane now with all the experts needed," Kanafani said. Albright convened the new round in her office, meeting with both Israeli Foreign Minister David Levy and Arafat's deputy, Mahmoud Abbas. Rost, the senior Mideast mediator in the Bush and Clinton administrations, stepped in, and then Albright met again with Levy. Israel sent 14 negotiators to the talks, including experts on the airport, seaport, industrial zone and corridor issues. "We think we can finish some deals here," said Gadi Baltiansky, spokesman for the Israeli Embassy. "The foreign minister has the full mandate to discuss the entire package."

"We are surprised the Palestinians didn't come with a similar team, and we hope in the next few days we will be able to conduct negotiations on all fronts," Baltiansky said.

Albright's ambitious agenda could expand Arafat's hold on areas of the West Bank, but that would require Israel's acquiescence. Promising to seek progress, Levy urged Arafat to stop predicting Israel would take an unyielding stance in the talks. Levy said both sides had to be flexible.

"We do not have a situation where one side demands and the other side must stand at attention and give in to every single demand," Levy told reporters on his arrival at the State Department. "Fulfilling the agreements requires that of both sides, working through the issues together to make progress." Albright wants Israel to stop building up settlements on the land it wrested from Jordan in the 1967 Six-Day War and to set a timetable for pulling back closer to its prewar border.

She also is urging the two sides to get started on terms of a final agreement even while they haggle over implementing interim accords reached in 1993 and 1995.

Those accords call for Israel to pull back but do not say how far, nor do they call for Israel to stop settling Jews on the land.

Studies show sun protects against cancer

By Paul Recer
Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C.— Basking briefly in the sun every day may be an important way to prevent breast cancer, researchers said yesterday. But they also warned, "Don't overdo it."

New studies indicate that vitamin D, a nutrient made by the skin during exposure to sunlight, can lower the risk of breast cancer by 30 percent to 40 percent and perhaps even more.

"We know now that a little bit of sun is beneficial, but it is not good to stay out there four or five hours," said epidemiologist Esther John of the North California Cancer Center. "We don't want to recommend that people go out and bake in the sun."

She said it is well known that excessive exposure to sunlight can cause skin cancer and premature aging of the skin.

John, in a study presented yesterday at scientific meeting of breast cancer experts, said that a study comparing the health habits of 133 breast cancer patients with women who did not have the disease found that exposure to sunlight significantly reduced the risk of breast cancer.

Sunlight lowers the risk, said John, because the skin uses ultraviolet rays from the sun to make vitamin D. This nutrient has been closely linked to protection against breast cancer in other studies, she said.

The study was part of a national research project that has been following the health of about 8,000 women since 1970. The research monitors the development of cancer and other health events, and compares the effects of such things as diet and exercise of women who get disease and those who don't.

John said that the study confirmed earlier findings that women who live in the southern tier of states below Kansas tend to get significantly less breast cancer than those who live in the North. The difference, she said, is sunlight and how the skin makes vitamin D.

Southern states have more year-round sunlight than Northern states do. As a result, people in the South get more natural ultraviolet ray exposure.

For instance, John said that winter sunlight is so weak in the North that people living at or above 40 degree North latitude do not get enough sun from November to February to make the required levels of vitamin D. Boston is at latitude 42 degrees.

John said the study did not determine just how much sun exposure is needed to protect against breast cancer, but she said it probably is less than what would cause skin damage.

"It is possible that all it takes is 10 or 15 minutes outside in bright sunlight to get a benefit," she said. "But we don't really know that yet. There needs to be more study."

Sunscreen lotions that block ultraviolet rays would also block the formation of vitamin D, she said.

Vitamin D can also come from the diet, said John. The vitamin is available naturally in fish oil, fatty fish, egg yolk and liver, all foods that few Americans eat, she said. Milk and some cereals and breads are fortified with vitamin D.

"If they depend on food only for vitamin D, women would have to eat foods with at least 200 international units a day to get a reduction in breast cancer risk," she said.

The administration responds

The administration has responded to GEO's proposals and say they hope GEO will accept their offer.

GEO's contract officially expired on June 30, 1996 and the University administration has been attempting to negotiate a new contract since March 1, 1996, said Associate Chancellor Susan Pearson in an Oct. 24 letter to the administration.

The administration understands that without a new contract there have been no stipend increases for a year and half, which has "impeded the ability of departments to recruit the best graduate students," Pearson said in the letter.

The administration has developed proposals for a new contract, Pearson said, which they said they hope GEO will accept.

The administration is offering a 4.75 percent increase for graduate student employees who were on the payroll in 1996-97, a 4.25 percent increase in 1997-98 and a 6.75 percent increase in 1998-99. These increases are only for state funded GEO eligible employees. Grant and trustee funded GEO positions were not included in the administration's proposal.

In addition to stipends, the administration agreed to allocate $100,000 a year for three years for a pilot flexible scheduling child care center, Pearson wrote in the letter. University representatives visited the Immanuel Lutheran Church that the GEO suggested for a potential child care center space but "state regulations may make it impossible to lease space in a reasonable time frame, given our interest in beginning this project fairly soon," Pearson wrote.

As an alternative, the administration said they have considered using the $100,000 a year to buy full-time spaces in local family day care homes and centers. They would then resell those spaces at a discounted rate and on a flexible scheduling basis to individual student parents.

The administration has also agreed to allocate $100,000 a year to the graduate school "for each of the three years of the GEO contract for fellowships and assistantships for members of disadvantaged and underrepresented groups," Pearson wrote.

These proposals to GEO are reasonable, according to the administration, who say GEO's demands have been "unrealistic."

Future plans

Since the letter-writing campaign has proved positive for GEO, they decided to continue the project because many more academic departments and various organizations on campus are interested in taking part, said Jennifer Fasulo, GEO vice president.

GEO said it plans to continue submitting letters to Chancellor Scott until the contract is settled.

A labor teach-in is GEO's next move of action, in which it will be asking TAs who teach courses on Thurs., Nov. 13 and Fri., Nov. 14 to move their classes from their normally occupied space to various visible and public spaces in the Student Union.

GEO is asking TAs to use its class time to teach about labor oriented issues, such as GEO's contract issues or the role of labor in higher education. If TAs are unable to break from the course syllabus schedule, GEO is still encouraging them to teach the class as planned, but re-locate to a visible space in the Student Union.

On Friday of the Labor Action/Teach-in, GEO is holding a rally at 12 p.m. on the Student Union steps.

The labor teach-in is not a strike, GEO said, but a way to show the campus community of the importance of graduate student employees.

"This is not a strike," Fasulo said. "It's intended to be a symbolic protest to highlight the work that graduate employees do and to protest the fact that we still don't have a settlement for a fair contract."

GEO said it is happy with their overall actions and contribute their success to the letter-writing campaign.

"We think it's been incredibly successful both because it has invited a lot more departments than we anticipated and because it's put a continual presence and pressure on the administration," Fasulo said.

GEO said it hopes the administration continues to respond until a compromise is reached.

"I'd like to see the administration continue to bargain with us and I think there's room to reach an agreement on all the remaining issues," Fasulo said.

Another affirmative action foe, Michele Justin of the Pacific Legal Foundation, added: "This ushers in a new era in civil rights. This ... affirms that equal means equal and that discrimination will prevail no longer."

But an angry Mark Rosenbaum of the American Civil Liberties Union of Southern California denounced the court's action. "For the first time in our nation's history, state and local governments have been stripped of their authority to remedy race and gender discrimination," he said. Enforcement of Proposition 209 leaves California "for the time being, at least, as the only state unwilling to stand up and take strong measures against gender and race discrimination within its borders," Rosenbaum said. Martha Davis of the NOW Legal Defense and Educational Fund predicted future litigation if other states adopt similar rollbacks of affirmative action. "The last thing we want is to hold up California as a model. I think it would be disastrous if Proposition 209 were exported to other states," she said. Davis also said the possibility exists that the California measure will be challenged again as individual programs are dismanled.

Republicans in Congress who have supported ending most forms of affirmative action praised the court's action.

Rep. Charles Canaday, R-Fla., said it "echoes the growing chorus of voices calling for equal protection of the law for all Americans."

He said the House Judiciary Committee later this week would continue its work on legislation similar to Proposition 209. It would ban the federal government from granting preferences in hiring, contracting and other programs.

The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals upheld the measure, adopted by a public initiative in 1996, last April.

Civil rights advocates then sought the highest court's help, contending that Proposition 209 would block even those government efforts to enforce racial or gender preferences that are "permitted or required" by the federal Constitution.

"Proposition 209 leaves public universities free to grant admissions preferences" to "children of alumni, donors or friends of university officials " the appeal said. "Municipalities are free to grant hiring preferences to veterans or those with close political ties to local officials."

Only preferences based on race and sex will be banned, the appeal said.

Lawyers for California and several local governments in the state urged the justices to reject the challenge.

"The fact that in some hypothetical case involving a particular set of circumstances the application of Proposition 209 may raise issues of ... constitutionality does not support (high court review)," state Attorney General Dan Lungren told the court.

Yearbook Staff Prepares for Record Turnout

By Arnold Layne
Index Archives

Amherst- For the 129th year in a row, the UMass Yearbook Club begins production on the University's prestigious Index, this year however, will be designed and published not only as the 129th yearbook by the Index, but also the first to present the yearbook as a tour guide to the University of Massachusetts at Amherst.

Asked on whether or not graduation seniors will be part of the yearbook, Managing Editor Loretta Kwan said "This year's book will not only include (Seniors), but will also include useful information on places to eat, places to go out to and also places to go when you're not feeling too well. There are a lot of places in this book. It's great!"

"Seniors will have to call the DaVor number to get in the yearbook. And quick." replied Editor-in-chief Jill Aordkian when asked how seniors will get in the book. "Last year we couldn't get all the Seniors in the book because they didn't get their photo taken soon enough."

This year the Index will be extending it's Senior Photo Shoot to allow for thousands of Seniors to get their photo in the book. Director of Marketing Sean Marien added "Seniors should call the number immediately. The earlier you call, the better chance you have to get in the book." The number to call for appointments is 1-800-836-05f58, and Seniors are encouraged to call as soon as possible during normal business hours.

> "The earlier you call, the better chance you have to get in the book." -Sean Marien

"You have to call, you can't get around that." Photo Editor Aaron Eccles reply to if there was another way for Seniors to get in the book. "If you don't call, you can't get in, you just can't! There's no way."

"There's no need to worry, every students who gets their photo taken is put in the book, well except that once but....." said Kwan on the likeliness of not getting in the book. "Just call the number and show up. That's it."

A new feature of the 1998 Index is the addition of the Grad Edition. "The Grad Edition is the best thing this campus has seen since the invention of the disposable lighter" Copy Editor Sean Maguire commented. The Grad Edition comes with the purchase of each yearbook. The Grad Edition will be available to Seniors before commencement, which gives graduates the opportunity to give parting comments to their friends in school.

President Clinton and Chancellor Scott were contacted about the Grad Edition, however both were unavailable for comment.

Aid too late for study abroad

I visited the International Programs Office at the beginning of the semester and left with a feeling of excitement and optimism. Not only did I find a program to suit my needs, I was also told that my financial aid could be used for the exchange, thereby making my study abroad experience possible. What wonderful opportunities UMass has for its students, I thought.

During the following months, I covered all the bases. I got my application in far ahead of time. I researched flights and got my international student ID card. I even enrolled in intensive Spanish and studied diligently.

Then, last week, I decided to speak with someone at the Financial Aid office. I wanted to make sure I was doing everything I needed to do and that my funds would be available before my departure in early January.

"Do they really envision students who study abroad as those who can afford to do so without financial aid?"

Brenda Santos

Like many other exchange programs, mine is a direct exchange. Most of the expenses — transportation, housing, food, books, etc. — are out-of-pocket and not covered by the fee for the exchange. This means that most of my financial aid would be in an excess check that I could use for these expenses.

My question for Financial Aid was how I could access my Financial Aid funds before leaving for the semester?

I was shocked by the answer. I spoke with the woman in charge of aid for students going on exchange. She maintained throughout our entire conversation that her job at Financial Aid was completely separate from International Programs. No one, she said, could do anything about the fact that I would receive my aid for the spring semester in March. UMass exchange students receive their aid for the the spring semester in March, and for the fall semester in November.

I tried to ask this woman, my financial aid "counselor," how I was expected to finance a semester abroad without receiving financial aid before my departure. She reacted with disbelief. Wasn't there anyone, she asked, who could put the money up front? She humiliated me with her contempt for my financial independence from my family. I was immediately disenchanted and angry.

Careful to keep my manners, I did not remind her that the University Financial Aid Office had determined my need and that my Financial Aid award was in response to that. Did she and her office agree that I had this need, but believe that my expenses would wait until March? Or do they really envision students who study abroad as those who can afford to do so without financial aid?

I ask the same question of the International Programs Office. Surely, they are aware that financial aid awards come out much later than most students leave to study abroad. Why, then, do they affirm that if you already receive financial aid to attend UMass, you can use your financial aid for your study abroad, period?

It is the responsibility of Financial Aid to see that the aid they grant to students is available for their use whether they are studying at UMass or on an exchange program. It is the responsibility of International Programs to see that the opportunities they offer to students are available to all students.

Brenda Santos is a UMass student.

Promise Keepers Bad at Life

It is surely a sign of cultural decay when a group can proclaim that this is an age of moral crisis — and uphold every idea that perpetuates it.

Such is the case with the Promise Keepers, a national organization of Christian men who promise to "Stand in the Gap" — to take charge of their families and their lives by recognizing and fulfilling the obligations set down in the Bible commanded by God.

"The solution to domestic problems isn't faith in God, but the consistent and relentless use of reason — defining one's values rationally, identifying the means of attaining them, and acting to achieve them."

Kieth Didion

The Promise Keepers' credo, as is true of Christianity in general, finds its roots in faith and self-sacrificial service. According to their doctrines, altruism, duty and sacrifice are the ideals toward which they should strive and the ideas by which they should live.

How do they come to this conclusion? Faith in the Bible. Intuition. Revelation.

While it is admirable for an individual to struggle to take control of his life after years of moral default, the principles by which the Promise Keepers live can only serve to cut their own throats.

Faith is not a "higher insight" — it is an attempt at cognition based on blind feeling and disregard of facts. As such, faith is opposed to reason. It is in direct opposition to the idea that knowledge comes from actual experience and reason.

Faith, by its very nature, leaves people without any practical guidance. Knowledge that doesn't come from this world can't be of any use in it.

The Promise Keepers demand the impossible of themselves. They seek to deal successfully with the world to take successful in their careers by rejecting their minds. Their approach to life leads to an insufferable contradiction: live life successfully and reject your only means of doing so.

The purpose of knowledge is success at life. If you cut off man's mind from reality, you necessarily cut off his actions from success.

The Promise Keepers, and any advocates of revelation, are convinced that the only way to improve their lives is to spurn reason and cling to faith. A religious view leads to the bizarre notion that reason — man's distinctive means of cognition — is an obstacle to his happiness and survival. By its very nature, moral code based on such a monstrous idea conflicts with practical, real-life success.

The Promise Keepers, we're told, champion "integrity," loyalty in action to one's convictions. But one cannot be loyal in action to a code of ethics that cannot be practiced.

What these men need is not to reject their minds, but to use them. The solution to domestic problems isn't faith in God, but the consistent and relentless use of reason — defining one's values rationally, identifying the means of attaining them and acting to achieve them.

Men do not need duties to God (or to anyone else); they need to pursue their values independently, without turning their wives into servile doormats or becoming doormats for the supernatural.

Promise Keepers founder, Bill McCartney, says, "The reason we see a downward spiral [of morality] in this nation is because the men of God have not stood together." The real reason for such a decline is that the men of the mind haven't stood up to oppose them. Paraphrasing philosopher Ayn Rand: What the Promise Keepers need now is not a return to morality — but to discover it.

Write for Ed/Op!

The Collegian Editorial page needs new writers. We want you to write humor, politics, satire, lifestyle, or any of a thousand other styles — let us be as broad as the student body is.

We especially encourage material that relates to current issues at UMass.

Anyone who is interested should submit material by e-mail (letters@oitvms.oit.umass.edu), fax (545-1592), or by dropping it off at the Collegian offices for Dan Bodah.

Editorials should be 500–700 words long and should include a phone number so we can call you back.

Elementary students an inspiration

To the Editor:

I am currently a graduate student here at UMass in the CTEP program at Mark's Meadow School. I am going for my master's in elementary education. I am writing this to inform everyone about what is going on at our school.

I'm working in a fifth grade classroom with 22 students and a great teacher. We are currently doing a unit on United States geography. The kids are planning their dream trips. They choose at least 10 places and write reports on them. They're going everywhere from Hawaii to Maine.

Never in my life have I seen kids work this hard. They are planning wonderful trips and every week they are writing a "fabulous facts" exercise about each state. They also do work sheet after work sheet of geographical mapping concepts. These students are relentless.

I am writing this for two reasons. One is to let everyone know how hard this class is working. I graduated from UMass last year and I didn't know anything about what was going on in elementary schools around this area. Well, I think you should know that Mark's Meadow students are truly excellent learners with an amazing work ethic.

Secondly, I wanted to let my students know how proud I am of them. With all the negative things we see on the news and the negative things we read about, the truly wonderful things are left unheard. These students should be extremely proud of their work, and I want them to know how special they all are. Nice work, room 177. I feel I am the luckiest intern, to be working with you.

Enjoy your dream trips! See you in Hawaii!

Senator calls for "democracy"

To the Editor:

It is true that we need to help minorities survive at the University of Massachusetts. It is essential to the well-being not only of the institution, but also of the students. The ability to study in a diverse environment can be considered the best educational tool available at the University.

We should not, however, undermine our democracy and our system of governance by supplying so many privileges to minorities when it comes to representation. Currently, the ALANA Caucus appoints 13 percent of the Senate body, thus creating an environment where it is relatively easy for them to pass legislation that, though good for minorities, is not necessarily best for the campus community.

I, as a minority, can only stress the need for further diversification. But we must ask ourselves if we are willing to undermine our democratic system in order to provide the few with greater or equal powers than the many? Are we willing to compromise the very values that our nation and this institution are founded on in order to create a sense of virtual equality? There must be better ways, and we must find them.

I believe that we must create electoral freedom and that if we do this right, proportional representation will be a reality. These beliefs rise from the fact that we have a multi- member plurality system, in which each area can present a variety of views through the election of multiple senators. This makes it possible to create an accurate recollection within the Senate of the student body, and thus perfect representation.

I ask for your support in creating a more democratic University, where students are adequately represented and no quotas are placed on the membership of the representative bodies. I urge you to support my case for democracy.

Congrats to the marching band

To the Editor:

"These guys are crazy, but I think you're crazier," was the assessment George N. Parks, director of the Minuteman Marching Band, made form atop his perch on the stairs of Alumni Stadium Saturday afternoon. The insanity Parks was referring to was the limitless enthusiasm of his 270 member band and the close to 200 fans who had remained in the cold and rain following the football game. But those who stayed were well rewarded. The band gathered at the base of the bleachers and played a bone-shaking version of "Maslaguena." And despite the miserable conditions, the band charged onto the field to blast out "Pinball Wizard."

I would like to extend a congratulatory hand to Mr. Parks and each and every member of the Minuteman Marching band. Not only have they continued to demonstrate a superior level of commitment, but also they have become the epitome of unbreakable enthusiasm. For example, due to the rain on Saturday, none of the band members who play woodwind instruments played. However, each and every one of them was on the field, in formation, and at attention. The entire band had been in the rain since 8 a.m. and here it was eight hours later, and they were still going strong.

It's easy to see the dedicaton and exuberance of the band is contagious. And what's not to love? Aside form consistently putting on a spectacular show, the band combines precision marching, spontaneity, and the biggest sound in New England week after week. I'm sure I'm not the first to suggest this, but has anyone ever thought about selling tickets to see the band? I'm sure any of the 200 people in attendance at the post-game show would be a potential buyer.

In closing, congratulations to the musicians, twirlers, soloists, flag-carriers, drum majors, assistants and directors of the UMass' Minuteman Marching Band for continuing the never-ending pursuit of excellence. Any UMass student or alumni should be proud to know they have such a fine group of representatives.

Karamazov Brothers juggle rhythms in FAC

The Flying Karamazov Brothers show off their zany stunts at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall tomorrow night.

By Emily Trask
Collegian Staff

As Brother Ivan Karamazov explains in one of his less elliptical asides: "Juggling is rhythm and rhythm is music. Therefore we conclude that juggling is music." The Flying Karamazov Brothers (they're not actually related) will fully illustrate that concept when they bring their zany tour de force "Sharps, Flats, and Accidentals" to the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall Wed., Nov. 5 at 8 p.m.

This show expands upon one they've just performed with symphony orchestras around the country, including the National Symphony at the Kennedy Center in Washington, D.C. Fans of the Flying K's already grasp their enduring appeal. However, for the uninitiated, the Brothers' act is indescribable.

The performance will consist of intricate rhythms beaten out with balls and clubs on the heads of various drums and cymbals. Melodies of J.S. Bach and W.C. Handy will be played on the keys of giant xylophones with juggled mallets; imagine Beethoven's "Ode to Joy" pounded out of the very heads of the helmet-wearing, radio-triggered, electronically sampled brothers themselves. But wait, there's more. They will dance a hip-hop ballet, play a Japanese-inspired taiko percussion selection on carefully tuned cardboard boxes, and perform Mozart's Bassoon Concerto on the baritone horn (the instrument for which Mozart would undoubtedly have composed the concerto had it only been invented before his demise).

"Sharps, Flats, and Accidentals" will also include a version of the Karamazov's single most significant contribution to the world of juggling, the electrifying improvisational club-passing called Jazz. And for fans of the bizarre and unexpected, they will also include that perennial favorite, The Gamble, where the audience brings whatever object of whimsy or terror they think will prove impossible, betting a standing ovation against a pie in the face that it can't be done. Please, no live animals or anything that might prevent the juggler himself from continuing to be a live animal.

The Brothers got their start on the streets 23 years ago. Since then they have gone on to bring their unique brand of theater to prestigious venues around the world with their highly successful productions. They have appeared in numerous performance halls around the globe, and have made numerous appearances on television for the likes of "Bill Nye the Science Guy" and "Seinfeld."

Obviously, this event is a great choice for families of all ages.

Tickets for The Flying Karamazov Brothers are $25, $20, and $15, ages 17 and under are $8, and Five College students are $5. For tickets and more information call (413) 545-2511 or 1-800-999-UMAS.

ourselves, and it would have been nice if we had something else in our tank to get to the NCAA's. The NCAA is looking for the number of quality wins, and they do not take in account our A-10 opponents.

"I feel they're quality opponents, but the region Dayton and Xavier are in really don't take them seriously. We have to hope SMU finishes strongly, and Michigan maintains their stature, for our quality wins to factor in the mix."

For Georgia coach Bill Barker, who was a teammate of Rudy's at Rollins College and his assistant coach at Central Florida, the Lady Bulldogs are in the same position concerning an NCAA bid. Now, Georgia is in a more comfortable position for the national postseason due to their record, and their strength of schedule — which at this point, outweighs the Minutewomen's.

"We're 7-3-1 against ranked teams this season, but you have to also think about all the politics involved with the NCAA," Barker said, about his third-year program. "They can sometimes cater to the program's who historically have done well, instead of the teams who are doing well now.

"I have never beat [Rudy], and it had to come sometime. And, because UMass is a great team, this win couldn't have come at a better time for us."

And what a successful season up to date has now done for UMass is the team has made their NCAA postseason hopes much more difficult for themselves. The Minutewomen have temporarily lost the way to win, but as they have already proven, they do know how to win.

"I didn't feel we were going to lose up until the final whistle," Rudy said. "We were finding ways to win, and now, we're finding ways to lose, but this team will be back."

Nomar Garciaparra recieves AL Rookie honors

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

NEW YORK, N.Y.—Nomar Garciaparra was the unanimous winner of the American League Rookie of the Year award Monday following one of the best seasons ever by a shortstop.

Garciaparra hit .306 for the Boston Red Sox with 30 homers, 98 RBIs, 122 runs and 22 steals. He set major league records for most RBIs by a leadoff hitter and most homers by a rookie shortstop. The 24-year-old Garciaparra, the sixth unanimous winner of the AL Rookie award, received all 28 first-place votes and 140 points in balloting by the Baseball Writers' Association of America. Other unanimous winners were Carlton Fisk (1972), Sandy Alomar Jr. (1990), Mark McGwire (1987) and Tim Salmon (1993).

Jose Cruz Jr., an outfielder traded from the Seattle Mariners to the Toronto Blue Jays, was second with 61 points, following by Anaheim pitcher Jason Dickson (27), Detroit shortstop Deivi Cruz (12), Cleveland pitcher Jaret Wright (7) and Chicago White Sox outfielder Mike Cameron (5).

Ballots were cast before the postseason, in which Wright went 3-0.

In a season where the Red Sox floundered, Garciaparra led the majors with 68 multihit games, and paced the AL with 209 hits and 11 triples. His 30-game hitting streak from July 26-Aug. 29 set an AL rookie record; four more than Guy Curtright's previous mark in 1943.

Garciaparra broke Johnny Pesky's Red Sox rookie record for hits (205 in 1942), and his 365 total bases broke Ted Williams' team rookie record (344 in 1939). He also became the first Boston player to reach double figures in doubles, triples, homers and steals since Jackie Jensen in 1956.

Garciaparra batted .241 in 24 games with the Red Sox in 1996, then won the shortstop job in spring training when John Valentin was moved to second base. Garciaparra became the fifth Boston player to win the award, following Walt Dropo (1950), Don Schwall (1961), Fisk and Fred Lynn (1975).

Phillips pleads guilty to drug accusations

FULLERTON, Calif. (AP) — Former Anaheim Angels outfielder Tony Phillips pleaded guilty to misdemeanor cocaine possession yesterday and was ordered into a drug diversion program that could clear his record.

Phillips, 38, entered the plea before Municipal Court Judge Michael Hayes. He must return at a later date to show proof of his enrollment in a drug program.

Phillips would have a year to successfully complete the program, after which the conviction would be expunged.

The Angels announced last week that Phillips, who was paid $1.8 million this year, will not be back next season.

Phillips was arrested Aug. 10 at an Anaheim motel. Police said he was trying to buy $30 worth of cocaine.

The Angels tried to suspend him after he declined to enter a drug rehabilitation program under the auspices of parent Walt Disney Co. But major league baseball overturned the suspension and Phillips soon returned to the lineup.

Traded to the Angels by the Chicago White Sox May 18, Phillips hit .275 with eight homers, 57 RBIs and 96 runs scored. He played several positions for the Angels.

Mavericks sign Aussie Anstey; in 'Blazer trade

DALLAS, Texas (AP) — The Dallas Mavericks signed Chris Anstey, the 7-foot center they acquired in a draft day trade with Portland, and waived forward Adrian Caldwell yesterday.

Anstey played six games for Dallas in a summer league, but then returned to his native Australia to finish his contract with the SE Melbourne Magic in the country's National Basketball League. He arrived in Dallas Sunday after the Magic lost to the Melbourne Tigers in the NBL championship.

Anstey was drafted 18th overall by Portland, but the choice was made for the Mavericks. The Trail Blazers then traded his rights and some cash to Dallas for Kelvin Cato, whom the Mavericks had taken at No. 15 for Portland.

General manager Don Nelson said he wanted the Australian all along but made the deal because it freed up almost $120,000 under the salary cap.

Anstey, 22, grew up playing mostly tennis, then got hooked on basketball at age 17 when his brother's team was a player short and he filled in. The tennis background shows in Anstey's nimble movement. Nelson calls him the best running big man he's ever seen. Caldwell, who was signed Oct. 21 to bolster a bench depleted by injuries, played three minutes in the season opener but remained on the bench during the second game.

Former Red's Golden Glover, Roy McMillan found dead

BONHAM, Texas (AP)—- Roy McMillan, a two-time NL All-Star for the Cincinnati Reds during the 1950s and a three-time Gold Glove winner, is dead after collapsing in his kitchen. He was 67. McMillan had good range and an excellent arm, but lacked offensive punch. Playing from 1951-66, the first 10 seasons with Cincinnati, he batted .245 with 68 home runs and 594 RBIs. He died at Northeast Medical Center after collapsing Sunday in his kitchen.

McMillan had just awakened, put on the coffee and smoked his first cigarette of the day, said longtime friend Bill Turnage. Jody Lawrence McMillan, McMillan's wife of 45 years, awakened soon after her husband and found him unconscious on the kitchen floor. "Jody didn't like the smell of smoke, so he'd get up a little before her, put the coffee on and go out on the back porch to smoke a cigarette," Turnage said. "We're assuming that his heart had failed him."

Turnage said Jody McMillan, who works for his agriculture supply company, told him that her husband had not been feeling well in recent weeks.

McMillan was a Bonham-area native who maintained his offseason home in the Northeast Texas city of 6,900 residents throughout his baseball career.

His best years were with the Redlegs, as the Reds were called then. He and second baseman Johnny Temple formed one of the best double-play combinations of the 1950s in the National League. In 1954, McMillan set a league season record with 129 double plays, a record that stood until Montreal's Bobby Wine turned 137 in 1970.

He also was durable; his NL record for consecutive games played at shortstop — 584 games from 1951-55 — still stands.

Before the 1961 season, the Reds traded McMillan to the Milwaukee Braves for pitcher Joey Jay, whose 21 wins in 1961 helped the Reds to their first league title in 21 years.

McMillan concluded his playing career with the New York Mets in 1964-66. He would later become a scout and manager in the Milwaukee and Mets organizations, becoming interim Mets manager for the final 53 games of the 1975 season after Yogi Berra's firing.

He was a member of the Texas Baseball Hall of Fame and the Ohio Baseball Hall of Fame.

McMillan's funeral is scheduled for 2 p.m. Tuesday at Wise Funeral Home in Bonham, with burial in Willow Wild Cemetery in Bonham.

finally have a consistent group going into the NCAA District 1 Qualifier, in two weeks.

"Leboeuf had a tremendous race, his best this year by far, and Brendan exhibited his potential, bouncing back from an earlier injury." O'Brien said. "Those three [Carrara, Leboeuf and Sullivan] were the highlight of the race."

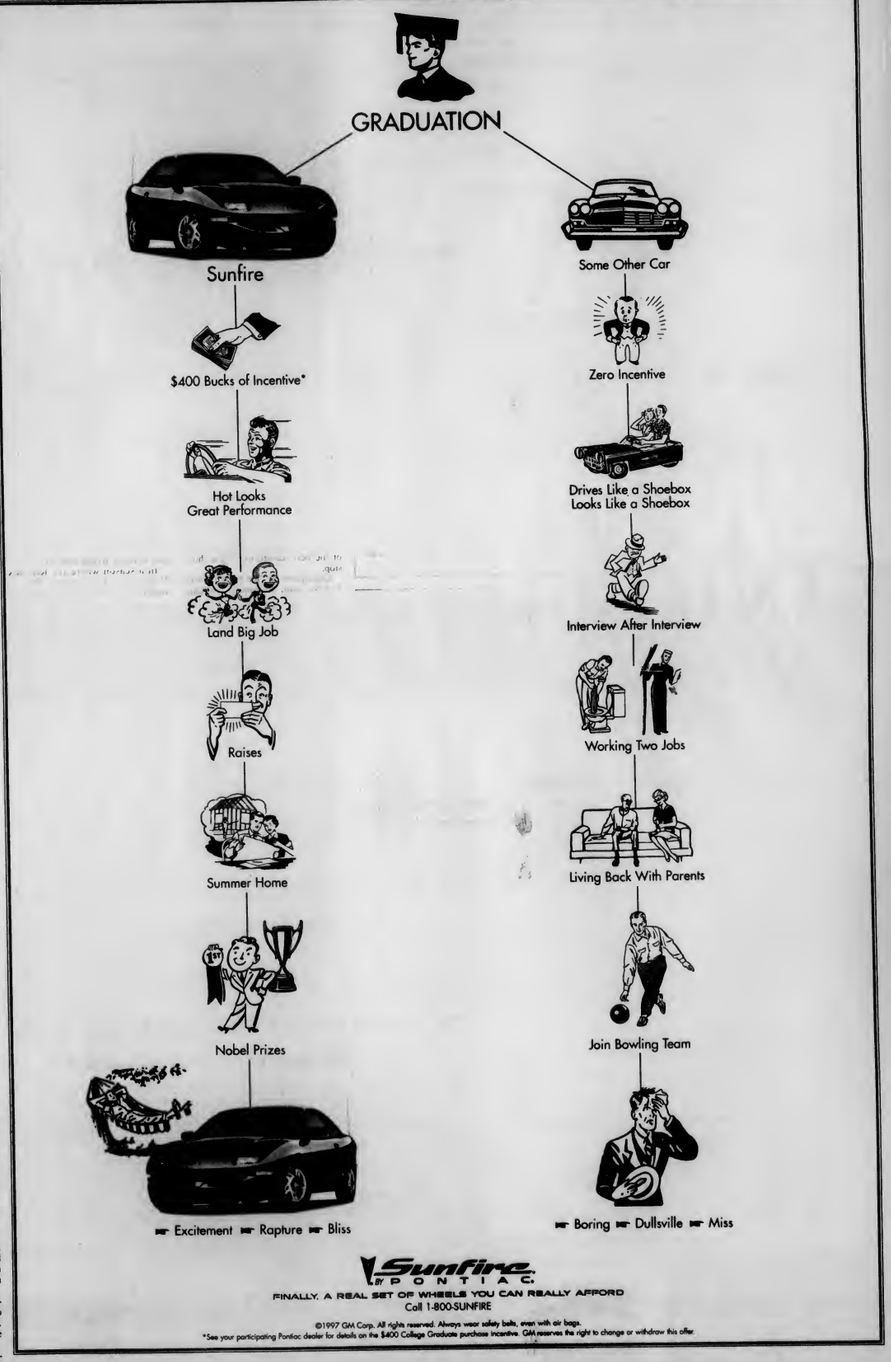
For seniors Carrara and Chabot, the District 1 Qualifier will mark their last collegiate race, for only two teams from New England/ New York of the 35 participating will advance to the NCAA Championships. The qualifying meet will be held Nov. 15 at Franklin Park in Boston.

CAMBRIDGE (AP) — In an unexpected move, former Boston Red Sox outfielder Wilfredo Cordero pleaded guilty yesterday to beating and threatening his wife.

He received a 90-day sentence, suspended for two years, and must attend regular batterer's counseling sessions. He will not serve any jail time.

"We followed Wil's request that he wanted to dispose of the matter without exposing his family to the stress and difficulty that a trial would cause," said Cordero's attorney, Mary Ames. Cordero plans to return to his Puerto Rican hometown of Mayaguez, where he will attend counseling sessions locally and report to a Massachusetts probation officer by phone, Ames said. Ames said Cordero has agreed to play winter baseball with the Caribbean League's Mayaguez Indians, one of several teams in Puerto Rico.

Cordero and his wife, Ana, have also purchased a home in Mayaguez, located on the western coast of the island, she said. The couple is expecting a second child in April, Ames said.



Cordero's change of plea came one day before jury selection was to begin in Cambridge District Court.

"We're very pleased with the outcome," said Anne Edwards, the lead prosecutor. "We had recommended this. It's a nice surprise." Cordero will attend about 40 weeks of group therapy, Edwards said.

A spokesman for the Middlesex County District Attorney's office said the arrangement with Puerto Rican authorities to provide Cordero with counseling was not unusual.

"We wanted him to take responsibility for what happened and get into counseling," said Brian Heffron. "This is the first time he has done that."

Heffron said the court also recognized that Cordero's professional opportunities in Massachusetts were limited.

Horoscopes

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You may make a new friend today who can prove highly influential in a number of important ways. Be willing to share your dreams openly.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — You may not agree with what you are being asked to do at this time but there may be no getting around the fact that the money's good.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — It may be difficult for you to refuse a special offer today, but it may prove important for you in a number of personal ways. Be strong.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — Affairs may prove more complicated than usual today, especially if your involvement with members of the opposite sex is increased in any way.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — You may encounter an obstacle that you cannot circumvent immediately. It will take time for you to figure out just how to get around it.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — A change is in store for you very soon, and today you'll want to tie up some loose ends in order to make yourself available for new things.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — An exciting time is coming, and you'll want to take advantage of all that it brings with it. Do not tie yourself down to empty endeavors.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — You may not be able to interpret a message that comes your way today in some form of code. If it's not a secret, ask for some help.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — You may be putting yourself and a loved one in jeopardy without even knowing it. Focus on doing things according to the rules.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You can be clever and creative all you want, provided you are doing what is asked of you. In the end, you can prove a valuable member of a big team.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You may be taking things too much for granted at this time. Ask a friend how best to proceed; you'll get the truth.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — Take care that indiscreet behavior doesn't become a liability at this time, for you may not be all that careful today.

Men's soccer falls to UCLA, Cal State Fullerton

By Jackie Leroux
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's soccer team got to take a trip to Los Angeles over the weekend, but they didn't exactly enjoy the best of times in California.

There was no fun in the sun for the Minutemen as they competed in the annual UCLA Pacific Soccer Classic. UMass competed against powerhouse UCLA — ranked No. 3 in the nation — and Cal State Fullerton, losing both games.

It was a disappointing ending to the season for the team. They returned from their trip only to discover they had failed to qualify for the Atlantic–10 Tournament, finishing their season and leaving them with a record of 11–7–1 overall and a conference record of 7–4.

With the end of this season, UMass, will lose two very key players, graduating seniors Mike Butler (Springfield) and Joenal Castma (Uniondale, N.Y.). Ironically, however, the two were fairly quiet over the weekend, with all of the scoring coming from this year's rookies, sophomore Gavin Hewitt (Seattle, Wash.) and freshman Seth Lilburn (Booton, N.J.).

THANG VO / COLLEGIAN

Fabio Maniatty and the Minutemen dropped two on their west coast trip to UCLA this weekend.

Lilburn scored UMass' only goal of the game in its 3–1 loss to UCLA. The Bruins scored first in the game with a goal at the 50:27 mark. Martin Bruno knocked in a rebound off of a shot from Nick Thesiof to put UCLA up 1–0. Lilburn tied it up for UMass with an unassisted goal at 80:56.

But UCLA quickly came firing back, getting goals from Nick Paneo at the 86:02 and another from McKinley Tennyson at 89:14, giving UCLA the lead and sealing the game for the Bruins.

Massachusetts keeper Todd Fowler had one save on the day, as did Bruins goalie Nick Rimando. UMass had two corner kicks to UCLA's six, and took five shots to UCLA's 16. The win upped UCLA's record to 14–2.

UMass took on Cal State Fullerton on Sunday, losing 2–1. The Titans scored the first two goals of the game, both in the first half. Sheldon Thomas netted the first goal, when he scored at the 7:30 mark, assisted by Alessio Smith. He was followed shortly by Duncan Dougliston, who scored at the 11:41, being assisted by Adam Black and Smith.

Hewitt attempted to start a comeback for the Minutemen, when he scored a goal at 30:12. He was assisted on the play by Butler and junior Paul Corcoran. But Hewitt's goal was all the Minutemen could muster, as Cal State held on for the win.

Fowler snagged four saves for the Minutemen, while Titan keeper Scott Alexander had five saves for Cal State. UMass had only one corner kick to the Titan's seven, and put in 11 shots to their 15.

Despite big wins a week ago over A–10 foes Fordham and La Salle and upset wins over nationally ranked teams, UMass will miss the A–10 tournament again this year. They started off the season atop the standings, but hit a nasty losing slide that knocked them off the top and wiped out their chances of making it to the tournament.

The Massachusett's men's soccer team couldn't rally for a win versus UCLA and Cal–Fullerton.

It was not a failed season, however. Along with several individual highs, the team had its own remarkable moments. One of the top highlights of this season was a win over powerhouse Boston University. The Minutemen beat the Terriers, then ranked No. 9 in the nation, with a score of 2– 1. In a game that went into overtime, UMass displayed its talents and potential and earned itself a national ranking. The win over B.U. was preceded by a win over then No. 22 New Hampshire.

A few games later the Minutemen had a spectacular game, completely shutting out No. 19 Temple, 4–0. But the Minutemen were unable to come through in several key A– 10 games. The Minutemen lost to conference opponents St. Bonaventure, Virginia Tech, George Washington, and Dayton.

Several individual players, however, were able to make their mark this season. Butler and Castma, who have been team leaders throughout their tenure at UMass, both had strong seasons, with Butler breaking several school scoring records. Lilburn and Hewitt quickly became top players for the squad. Despite being newcomers, they did make a serious impact, and will undoubtedly only improve in the years to come.

All that resulted in the lesser team on the day winning the match, for the second match in a row, and the Minutewomen being held scoreless for the first time all season.

For UMass coach Jim Rudy, the two losses this weekend now puts his team in a much more pressurized situation this upcoming weekend. The Minutewomen now have to win the Atlantic 10 Tournament to assure themselves an automatic NCAA Tournament bid, which is tougher than previous years due to ascension of teams like Dayton and Xavier in the historically weak conference.

Leaving anything else up to the not–so–consistent rulings of the NCAA committee is precarious at best, and the "have- to's" now outweigh any sort of judgment call at best.

"Now, we need to take care of business, and win our tournament," Rudy said. "We leave nothing else optional for

Solid NCAA hopes rest in A–10 for UMass with 1–0 loss to Bulldogs

ATHENS, Ga. — Up until this past weekend, the No. 16 Massachusetts women's soccer team found ways to win tight games. Whether it was by solid goalkeeping, timely goal scoring or a stifling defense, the Minutewomen (15–4) seemed to have an angel on their shoulder, and the victory would come their way — one way or another.

After wrapping up their two–match road swing with their second consecutive loss, a 1–0 heartbreaker to the Lady Bulldogs on Sunday afternoon, the devil was certainly down in Georgia, and the soul he was looking to steal was the Minutewomen's. Combined with Friday's 4–3 loss to Clemson, UMass can only seem to find ways to lose at this point of the season, and that angel has temporarily left for warmer climates.

Truly, two important losses to strong strength of schedule opponents did not happen because of a lack of trying — most of the time, that is.

However, junior Bentley Bickerstaff's goal with 2:08 remaining in the match on Sunday culminated a weekend where UMass controlled the pace for the majority of the time, but were the minority when the final score flashed in dot matrix on the scoreboard of the Georgia Sports Complex.

A 17–minute span against the Tigers on Friday, where the cohesiveness of the central midfield for the Minutewomen was blown away in the brisk northern Georgia wind, signalled their eventual demise, with four unanswered goals in that period giving Clemson just enough of a margin for the 4–3 win.

On Sunday, UMass came out strong, stifling any Georgia offense whatsoever, and finding their offense in the final half of the field with regularity. The Lady Bulldogs did not get its first quality scoring opportunity until the 27th minute, when junior Mandy Aiken's header sailed a few feet over the crossbar.

But, a failure to capitalize on one–on–one's with junior goalkeeper Meredith McIntire hurt the Minutewomen all day and weekend long. An early scoring chance by sophomore Emma Kurowski in the 15th minute, who broke Georgia's offside–style trap for a shot that just sailed over the crossbar was a sign for things to come.

Continued offensive pressure did not bring about a goal for UMass, and later opportunities by sophomore Tarah Tokarchik, who hit the crossbar at the beginning of the second half, senior Erica Iverson, who just missed a goal off a free kick with :35 left on the clock, and freshman Kara Green were not to be — almost by fate, if you will.

Cross country takes 5th place

By Scott Hamill

Entering the season, the Massachusetts men's cross– country team was ranked sixth or seventh in the Atlantic 10, reflecting the team's skill and experience levels at the time. Two months later, however, UMass finished in fifth place, five points distancing them from fourth, at the conference championships held last Saturday at Bull Run Park in Virginia.

For the first time in his career, senior Ryan Carrara earned A–10 All–Conference honors, placing tenth. Carrara covered the 6.2 mile course in 26:28. Also placing for the Minutemen were sophomore Kevin Somers, 26th in 27:15; junior Dan Leboeuf, 35th in 27:34; senior Brian Chabot, 36th in 27:37; and freshman Brendan Sullivan, 37th in 27:38.

Virginia Tech took the championship, finishing with 19 total points, followed by LaSalle with 67, St Joe's with 84, URI with 139, and UMass with 144.

For Carrara, this is one of the best performances of his career, and it comes at a great time, with most likely only one more collegiate cross–country race. Coach Ken O'Brien could not be more pleased with the senior captain.

"I'm really happy with Ryan's performance," O'Brien said. "He made All–Conference, and had a great race."

O'Brien is also pleased with the progress of his fourth and fifth runners, Leboeuf and Sullivan. All season long, Carrara, Somers and Chabot have been consistent top three runners and the Minutemen have had a tough time with those fourth and fifth runners, but seem to

Montserrat evacuation called by governor

SALEM, Montserrat (AP) — The new British governor gave islanders living in a danger zone three days to leave, saying Montserrat's volcano is threatening its biggest eruption yet.

"I am determined that the volcano should not be allowed to claim another life," Gov. Anthony Abbott said yesterday amid accusations that British inaction led to the deaths of 19 people in a major eruption earlier this year.

Abbott gave an estimated 100 residents of the west coast towns of Salem, Frith's, Fleming and Old Towne until tomorrow evening to vacate the area. The government will impose a fine of $185 on anyone found inside the danger zone after tomorrow.

Previously, he had threatened to cut utilities, but never did so. Abbott said he wouldn't use force to evacuate residents. Several people told The Associated Press they intend to stay, regardless of the government order. They maintain the area is safe and said they do not want to move to overcrowded shelters. For months, scientists have been saying the towns are too close to the smoldering Soufriere Hills volcano. Richard Luckett, a British seismologist at the Montserrat Volcano Observatory, said yesterday that there was no new threat, though a major explosion remains "a very real worry."

AOL wins court order blocking "spammers"

NEW YORK (AP) — America Online has won a court order blocking bulk e-mails from a company accused of bombarding the online service's members with pornography and hiding behind bogus return addresses.

On Friday, a federal court in Alexandria, Va., barred Las Vegas-based Over the Air Equipment from sending any unsolicited e-mail, known as "spam," to AOL members.

The preliminary injunction took effect immediately.

"We've won the first round in our fight against unsolicited junk e-mail," said AOL lawyer George Vradenburg. "The court's ruling... gives us a powerful weapon to use in our continuing campaign against junk e-mail."

The phone number listed for Over the Air Equipment in Las Vegas was disconnected.

AOL filed a federal lawsuit Oct. 2, charging that Over the Air Equipment's e-mails offered pornography over the World Wide Web. The lawsuit also alleges that Over the Air Equipment used the AOL trademark without permission.

Bulk e-mail makes up a significant portion of the 17 million e-mails that AOL handles daily. The mass e-mails usually offer ways to lose weight or make money quickly. Pornography also is common. AOL has about 9 million subscribers, making it the world's largest online service.

Holocaust descendants discuss legacy

By Bryan Schwartzman
Collegian Staff

If we get beyond the labels, dialogue can create empathy and understanding between human beings, Clemens Kalischer said, following a discussion between "Descendants of the Holocaust and the Third Reich."

Last night in the Campus Center, four members of One by One, a group of Jews and Germans committed to dealing with the effects of the Holocaust and the second generation, shared their stories with an audience of approximately 45 people.

The four panel members came from very different perspectives, ranging from perpetrator to victim, and each expressed a deep need to voice their experiences.

"By listening to one another... we are interrupting the transmission of inter–generational hate and prejudice," said Bebbie Roth Hone, who is an Amherst resident and group member.

Hone introduced the speakers but did not participate in the discussion.

Helga Miller spoke for the first time publicly about her bouts of depression and her search for facts about her father's past. Her father, originally from Russia, was married on the same day as the outbreak of World War II in Poland. In German–occupied Poland, he became involved with the German army. In 1954, he was killed in a motor bike accident, she said.

"I did not know anything about World War II... I lived in a vacuum," Miller said.

Miller was married and had two children, but on Christmas Eve, nearly 30 years after her father's death, she felt the desire to kill herself. She visited a therapist who said it was essential for her to find out what her father had done during the war years.

She discovered that her father was responsible for the liquidation of Jews from Lida, in White Russia, and had killed many.

"Whatever you know about [sadism] in World War II, it was written down," she said.

Miller said One by One was where she belonged, because she needed to tell and share her stories with others who were emotionally effected by the Holocaust.

Milena Pribis' dual identity is the result of her parents' marriage — her mother was a Polish–Jewish survivor and her father was a Yugoslave Lutheran who was involved with the resistance against the Nazis. Pribis was converted to Lutherism and didn't know of her Jewish identity until later.

"My parents wanted me to be a happy, normal adult as if nothing had happened, but that was not possible," Pribis said.

From World War II, to life as a refugee in Israel at the outbreak of the six–day war, to the recent horror in her native Yugoslavia, she said that war has followed her most of her life.

"Here, there are pieces of every which part of me, people I share history with," Pribis said.

Gottfried Leich was "mesmerized," by Nazi propaganda and spent the war years as part of the Hitler youth movement. He said his involvement stemmed from a need to belong, and the lack (at the time) of any tradition of individualism in Germany.

KEN MC DONALD / COLLEGIAN

Descendants of the Third Reich and the Holocaust in Dialogue. (R–L) Helga Miller, Melena Pribis, Gottfried Leich, and Clemens Kalischer.

"I joined the group to face this reality," Leich said.

When Leich was 10 years old, on the day after the "Night of Broken Glass," he encountered a group demolishing a storefront with them and went inside, stealing a flashlight battery. He said his father gave him a disapproving look but did say anything.

"I don't understand how he could combine these two things, being a minister and being silent [against the Nazis]," he said.

Clemens Kalischler was fortunate, when he was 13 his family left Germany in 1933 after Hitler was elected.

"I was on the train with my father and I remember thinking, Heil Hitler, I'm leaving," Kalischler said.

His family emigrated to France, and eventually Hitler caught up with them. He said they were all put in different work camps. He wasn't sure if it was because they were Germans or Jews. (France initially resisted the German invasion.)

Several years ago in Berlin, Kalischler conquered his fear of speaking in German and addressed a Christian congregation.

Following the service, someone approached him and said, "We apologize for what we [Germany] did to you, and to ourselves."

Au pair's verdict challenged as millions wait for outcome

By Richard Lorant
Associated Press

CAMBRIDGE — With protesters outside holding up signs such as "IQ Tests for Jurors," Louise Woodward's lawyers acknowledged yesterday that their all-or-nothing strategy "can be seen as a mistake" and asked a judge to reduce the English au pair's murder conviction to manslaughter.

Millions watched on television — among them, Ms. Woodward from her prison cell — as the defense focused on getting the verdict down to the very charge her lawyers fought to keep the jury from even considering.

Superior Court Judge Hiller B. Zobel said that he could rule as early as today. And he said he will take the extraordinary step of issuing the decision on the Internet through media and legal Web sites.

During yesterday's hearing, defense attorney Harvey Silverglate said the strategic decision to let the jury consider only first- or second-degree murder in the death of 8-month-old Matthew Eappen now "can be seen as a mistake."

In hindsight, he said, "by any definition, the evidence in this case could fit into manslaughter."

But prosecutors said Ms. Woodward and her lawyers are just shopping around for a better deal and should not be allowed a reduced charge unless she admits what she did.

House prepares for close vote on death penalty bill

By Glen Johnson
Associated Press

BOSTON — One House member postponed a Hawaiian vacation and another readied to skip a gubernatorial trade mission to Canada, as the Legislature prepared for a close vote on a death penalty bill. A conference committee charged with resolving differences between death penalty bills passed by the House and Senate met for a second time yesterday, amid signs it might soon have a merged bill ready for an enactment vote in each chamber.

"I'm optimistic the conference committee will be done very, very quickly," said House Minority Leader David Peters, (R-Charlton), as he headed into the committee meeting at the Statehouse.

In speaking with some of the other conferees, it quickly became clear that the growing concern in the Legislature was not getting a bill for a final vote. Rather, it was making sure that all members would be in attendance when the roll is called.

The Senate bill, which allows a death sentence for 12 crimes, including murdering a police officer, passed last month by a healthy 22-14 margin.

But the House bill, which creates capital punishment for 15 crimes, including domestic violence cases that result in murder, passed last week by the slimmest of margins: 81-79. A one vote swing within the 160-member body could doom the bill.

House Speaker Thomas Finneran, while a death penalty opponent, sent a letter to each of his members on Monday, telling them that a death penalty vote was fast approaching. He urged members to stay near the Clinton warns Saddam not to make "big mistake"

By Terence Hunt
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Clinton warned Saddam Hussein yesterday it would be "a big mistake" to try to shoot down American U-2 spy planes flying over Iraq.

In his first public comments on the escalating tensions with Baghdad, Clinton urged that efforts be redoubled to end the crisis through diplomacy. But the administration made clear that it was not backing down.

Defense Secretary William Cohen warned of "serious consequences" if any U.S. planes are attacked. Clinton expressed determination to prevent Iraq from acquiring weapons of mass destruction.

In Iraq, Saddam's lieutenants turned back U.N. weapons inspectors for a second day. Iraq has threatened to expel seven Americans from the inspection team, claiming they are spies. White House spokesman Mike McCurry, asked about Saddam's intentions, mocked the Iraqi leader. "It's just literally impossible to imagine what goes into such a convoluted and tortured mind," McCurry said.

Clinton urged Saddam to comply with U.N. resolutions and allow weapons inspections to proceed unhindered. "If he has nothing to hide, if he's not trying to develop weapons of mass destruction, then he shouldn't care whether Americans or anyone else are on the inspection team.

"This may be just another dodge," the president said of Saddam's threats.

Asked how the United States would respond if Iraq targets American-piloted U-2 flights, Clinton replied: "That would be a big mistake."

Clinton, talking with reporters in the Rose Garden, said the U-2 flights are carried out under the authority of the United Nations for a U.N. mission. "We will continue to consult with our allies on that."

"But let me say again," Clinton added, "the world has an interest, stated in the United Nations Security resolution, in preventing Iraq from developing weapons of mass destruction. That's what this is all about. There is an inspection regime which has clearly been approved by the United Nations. And Saddam Hussein must restore respect and opportunity for that inspection regime. That's all this is about. And

Iraqi biological weapons plans found

CAIRO, Egypt — A U-2 spy plane makes sweeps high over Iraq while helicopters below click pictures of specific sites.

Chemical sensors sample air outside factories suspected of making chemical weapons. Video cameras monitor other factories, transmitting pictures to U.N. officer in Baghdad to ensure that Iraq is not secretly making parts for long-range missiles. The U.N. weapons program is among the most intrusive courses of action taken against a vanquished foe — and it has uncovered Iraqi efforts to build some of the most horrifying weapons ever developed.

In one case, inspectors sifting through import documents uncovered an Iraqi program to build enough biological toxins, such as anthrax and botulism, to kill millions. The documents showed that Baghdad had purchased 40 tons of growth media, far more than would have been needed for decades of routine research and hospital use.

Awards, scholarships

Dionisios Vlachos, professor of chemical engineering at the University of Massachusetts, has been awarded two separate grants from the National Science Foundation (NSF) totaling $565,000.

The new awards include a four-year, $200,000 CAREER award, which is aimed at supporting the work of young faculty members, and a three-year, $165,000 award which focuses on how flames are extinguished in terms of chemistry and fluid mechanics.

With the grants, Vlachos will peruse his research in making chemical processes safer — work that could be used in fields as diverse as creating fireproof materials for use in airlines, producing high performance computer chips, and making chemical processes environmentally benign.

In his past research, Vlachos has been studying the physical laws that govern fire.

A record five out of 29 graduate students who this fall begin their studies toward a master's degree in sport management at UMass are recipients of NCAA post-graduate scholarships.

Amy Giovanni, of Sunnyvale, Ca. and Jane Silkman, of Princeton, N.J., have been awarded NCAA Women's enhancement Program Post-Graduate Scholarships; Elizabeth Fagan, of Shrewsbury, N.J., and Jonathan Kinloch, of Bellingham, Wash., have received Post-Graduate Scholarships for Student Athletes; and one Tiffany Walker, of Athens, GA, is the recipient of an NCAA Minority Enhancement Program Post-Graduate Scholarship for Careers in Athletics.

The NCAA Women's Enhancement and Ethnic Minority Programs annually award 10 scholarships, worth $6,000 each, to women and members of ethnic minorities. Post-Graduate Scholarships for Student Athletes, valued at $5,000, are awarded every year to 174 student athletes who have excelled academically and athletically and who are in their last year of eligibility.

Freshmen Eugene Boss, of Belchertown, Ann Rutherford, of Ware, and Carly Beliveau, of Springfield, have each been awarded $1,000 scholarships through the Massachusetts Mutual Scholarship fund.

The scholarships are aimed at Springfield area high school students who are both academically outstanding and active in community service.

In order to improve customer service, the UMass parking service has appointed a new parking manager and made organizational changes to increase efficiency.

Michael Brennan is the new parking manager, while Cathy Clark has been hired as assistant manager for operations.

Initiatives to improve services include: an overhaul of the permit renewal process that lays the groundwork for a multi- year automatic renewal; a redesigned appeals program; a new telephone answering system; and an improved customer service area in the parking office.

Also, permit holders can now use MasterCard or Visa for parking fees; in January, the UCard will also be accepted.

In addition, officers are sporting new uniforms featuring the school colors, rather than the brown, military-style uniforms of the past.

A new staff training program has been using input from employees to implement change and contribute to other customer service improvemens.

One of the main issues being tackled in the future is parking fees, and the fee structure recommended by last year's report of the Parking and Transportation advisory Borad. Presently, fees are on the bargaining table between the University and the employee unions.

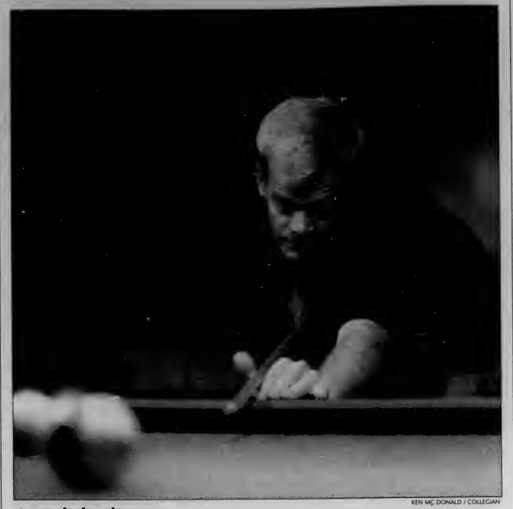
"The defense theory, if it worked, would have been brilliant. It did not work," said prosecutor Martha Coakley. "You cannot come back in and say, 'The devil made me do it.'"

A jury found Ms. Woodward, 19, guilty of second-degree murder Thursday, determining she fatally shook and slammed Matthew on Feb. 4, the day she called 911 to say the child was having trouble breathing. He died five days later. Ms. Woodward, a round-faced young woman from the English village of Elton, denied hurting the boy.

The dispute has put the judge at the center of a case that has grown from the subject of local fascination to an international cause célèbre.

The judge can declare Ms. Woodward innocent; overturn the verdict and order a new trial; reduce the conviction; or uphold the verdict.

Second-degree murder, defined as intentionally killing another person with malice, carries a mandatory sentence of life in prison with the possibility of parole after 15 years.



Manslaughter, defined as causing a death by a reckless action that showed disregard for life, is punishable by up to 20 years, but there is no minimum sentence; Ms. Woodward could be released from prison immediately.

Defense attorney Barry Scheck, gesturing forcefully with the same aggressive style he brought to the O.J. Simpson case, told the judge the case hinged on complicated scientific evidence — a hint at an article Zobel once wrote in which he said jurors often are asked to consider matters too complex for them.

Scheck complained that the prosecution had not disclosed one set of autopsy photographs of the boy's skull until the end of the trial. He said the photographs showed healing of his skull fracture, indicating the injury occurred before Feb. 4.

But the judge interrupted him, saying it was the defense's decision about what points to make or not to make.

"I'm getting weary of your telling me how much this would have made a difference when you didn't put it in," Zobel said. "It's inappropriate that you should now say, 'Well, we decided not to put it in, but if we had put it in, this is what we would have done.'" Ms. Coakley scoffed at the suggestion the photograph would have changed the verdict, saying X-rays entered into evidence were far more convincing than any photograph. The state "didn't claim that Martians killed this baby. It was clear what the evidence was," Ms. Coakley said.

Sanctions tightened against Sudan

By George Gedda
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Secretary of State Madeleine Albright announced yesterday that the U.S. is tightening sanctions against Sudan's pro-Iranian government, citing the African country's involvement in international terror and its "abysmal record" on human rights.

She said President Clinton has taken steps to block Sudanese government assets in the United States and to bar most U.S.-Sudanese trade. Also prohibited are U.S. investments in Sudan and most financial transactions between the two countries.

"We take these steps because the government of Sudan has failed to respond to repeated expressions of concern or to the imposition of lesser sanctions," Albright said.

"Instead, it has earned international condemnation by persisting in its objectionable policies, causing us to conclude that more dramatic action is required."

Repeated efforts to reach the Sudanese Embassy for comment were unsuccessful.

The sanctions do not affect U.S. humanitarian activities in Sudan. These programs have totaled about $650 million since 1988. Albright said some trade and financial activities with Sudan may be allowed to continue if they are deemed in the U.S. interest. Two-way trade last year totaled an estimated $70 million, of which $50 million consisted of U.S. exports. No figures were immediately available on the amount of Sudanese assets in the United States. The Clinton administration has said that Sudanese officials were involved in an assassination attempt in 1995 against Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak.

A U.N. Security Council resolution demands that Sudanese officials provide access to three suspects wanted in the case. Recently, the administration accused Sudan of sponsoring insurgencies in neighboring Eritrea, Ethiopia and Uganda.

There also have been allegations that Sudan runs camps for training foreign terrorists and allows terrorists to enter and leave the country freely. Sudan has close ties to Iran, long criticized by the West as the chief exporter of Islamic radicalism. State Department spokesman James P. Rubin said the United States has been seeking support from allied countries for stronger sanctions against Sudan. He said the effort has not been successful.

Sudan is one of seven countries listed by the State Department as sponsors of international terrorism. The 14-year Sudanese civil war, one of the world's bloodiest, has claimed more than 1 million lives.

Already existing measures against Sudan restrict U.S. exports, control some incoming financial transactions from the Sudanese government and limit visa issuance to Sudanese officials. The new measures make the ban on exports comprehensive, impose a total ban on imports from Sudan and prohibit U.S. investment in Sudan. Yesterday's announcement could clarify recent confusion of U.S. policy toward Sudan. In September the State Department announced that U.S. diplomats would be returning to Sudan after an absence of almost two years. Shortly thereafter, the administration said the announcement was premature. Rubin said yesterday there is still no decision on whether to send diplomats back.

we have to be very firm about it." Urging a peaceful solution, Clinton said, "I believe at this moment we should do everything we can do resolve this diplomatically and we should reserve judgment. This ought to be resolved diplomatically."

"The flight… will continue this week," by the U-2 are aimed at determining whether Iraq is hiding nuclear or chemical weapons," Cohen said.

"Should there be any effort to attack that aircraft or put that mission in any danger, we would view it… as a very grave matter with serious consequences," Cohen said. He spoke at a photo opportunity with Israeli Defense Minister Yitzhak Mordechai. Cohen declined to discuss the exact timing of the flight or whether U.S. fighter planes would be dispatched as a protective escort.

"We believe the flight should go forward, it should proceed safely to carry out its mission of inspection, and we expect the Iraqis to observe that," Cohen told reporters.

with the cat," said Tim Trevan, who served on the weapons inspection team from 1992-95.

The inspectors' job is to verify that Iraq has destroyed its weapons of mass destruction and accepted a monitoring system — a requirement of Security Council sanctions imposed after Iraq's 1990 invasion of Kuwait, which led to the Persian Gulf War. The inspectors say Iraq has not done so.

In the latest confrontation, Iraqi President Saddam Hussein demanded that all American weapons inspectors leave the country, accusing them of spying. But the United Nations has said it will not allow Saddam to blackball monitors from any country.

Although Americans make up less than half of the inspectors, their expertise is crucial to many of the missions.

The United States' "biotech industry is 10 times that of the rest of the world," Trevan said. "It is not a luxury to have the United States, it is a requirement."

Iraq has had a long history of obstructing inspections, and confrontations occasionally have turned hostile.

In July 1992, Iraqi officials threatened inspectors during a three-week standoff outside the Agriculture Ministry, where inspectors believed documents on long-range missiles were hidden. "Gunshots were fired into the air to intimidate inspectors," Trevan said. "Stones and vegetables were thrown at inspectors, and there was an attempted stabbing of an inspector."

The threats, the inspectors say, are part of a deliberate policy.

"As soon as they got close to something, the Iraqis would start [illegible] to physically obstruct the inspection," Trevan said.

In other instances, monitors have accused Iraq of loading banned material into rail cars and trucks, then shuttling it around the country to frustrate inspectors.

Inspectors also have watched smoke rise from buildings suspected of housing crucial documents while officials forced them to stay back.

Weapons monitoring is not all high drama. U.N. inspectors comb through thousands of pages of documents trying to meticulously piece together details of past programs to build chemical and biological weapons and long-range missiles.

In the process, inspectors have uncovered at least one experimental Iraqi program to isolate weapons-grade plutonium and have supervised the destruction of 125,000 gallons of chemical weapons. Iraq also has admitted under pressure to having produced 130,000 gallons of botulism and anthrax toxins it says it destroyed before the Gulf War.

Saddam has dismissed allegations that Iraq is withholding information on its banned weapons programs as "excuses used in order to prolong the sanctions" and has compared Iraq to "an occupied country."

Smoking can stay!

Hollywood always seems to take the brunt of any social devastation, including the rise in teenage smoking. The possibility that the presence of smoking in movies is hypnotizing teens into getting an elder to buy them some butts is preposterous. With the wealth of anti-smoking information that society is bombarded with, the effects that films may possibly have on the general public are negated.

K. Carlson

The movie industry brings us around the world to show viewers different experiences from all walks of life. Movies are designed to make us think, to make us realize life in different ways, but not to take control of our lives. Any reasonably sane person understands this, and although teens are experiencing the most tumultuous time of their lives, they do know right from wrong. And they understand being impressionable for their age, whether they care to admit it or not.

True, there was that unbelievable occurrence when a couple of crazy teenagers mimicked a murder scene from Natural Born Killers. The operative word there is crazy. Those kids obviously had serious mental health problems if they would go so far as to kill someone because they thought Mickey and Mallory Knox were "cool" for going on a killing rampage.

Cigarettes then seem to be a lesser evil, something realistic that people can emulate. People with addictive personalities will smoke whether they see it in the movies or not. Taking smoking out of films will not change the number of people who become addicted. Cigarettes are all around us, and the amount of smoking in our society feeds off of its own presence. Kids are more apt to experiment with smoking if they see their older brother doing it, not because Rambo lit up after a bloody massacre. Nor are they more likely to try to buy a "rocket launcher to blow up their neighbor.

Certain character roles call for smoking, whether it be cigarettes or cigars, Marlboros or Phillies. The use of tobacco literally "makes" some characters. Could you ever imagine the Godfather without his cigar? Sitting in the shadows behind his enormous desk without smoke swirling in the single shaft of light? Or Sharon Stone without a cigarette in her famous scene from Basic Instinct? That whole scene revolved around the fact that she was doing something outlandish even before she shifted in her seat.

If you look back through movie history, you will see that the amount of cigarettes smoked, flicked into ashtrays, and driven by on billboards has not changed. These appearances have been given the term "tobacco events" by film industry analysts. The people that are pursuing the media are the same ones that had the tobacco companies' doors slammed in their faces. Maybe they are bitter about getting cancer, but Hollywood didn't make them smoke those cancer sticks.

Taking smoking out of the movies would be like telling baseball players to stop chewing tobacco because teenage boys are a huge part of their viewing audience. It is inherent that some players will chew. There is a chance that young boys will look up to their favorite athletes and then pack a lip. But after one bad experience swallowing this vile stuff, most never touch it again. It happens the same with cigarettes: after one long inhalation that leads to their first smoke-induced coughing fit, they will stop. If they decide to continue on with these nasty habits on their own, and the threat of losing their entire jaw to cancer does not faze them, then getting lung cancer will not bother them either. Most teens can't make plans a week in advance, so how are they supposed to look that far into their cancerous futures? If advocates think that taking smoking out of the movies will solve tobacco consumption problems, they are wrong. They will have to try to ban chew from baseball, too, if they want to cover all of their bases.

In 1990, it was discovered that over the past 30 years the ages for those smoking in the movies changed dramatically. "Tobacco events" concerning young people (ages 18–29) shot up from 21 percent to 45 percent, more than doubling in number, while the next oldest age group (ages 30–45) fell by almost half, from 39 percent to 21 percent. This correlates with the recent rising rate of teenage smoking. But do the movies determine life? Or does life determine what we see in the movies? Films are artist's representations of what they see as life. If they see teenagers smoking, they will include it in their movies to get as close to actual life as possible. When the teenage smoking rate starts to decline because of the price increase and more health statistics start to sink in to kids' thick skulls, there will be less smoking portrayed by lead characters in films.

Teens are a rebellious breed, and they will do things that their parents do not want them to do. We as a society have to accept the fact that kids will be kids, and learn not to blame Hollywood for the things that we should be educating our peers about. Smoking was an addiction long before the teenage levels of smoking increased. Cigarettes increased in popularity over the years because of special promotions aimed at teens, like Marlboro miles, which, when collected, can be turned in for special gifts like lighters and jackets. Hollywood is simply showing us how it is.

U.S. makes hypocritical demands

Heckling. Protesting. Opposition. Support.

That's what the President of China, Jiang Zemin, faced over the weekend when he went to Harvard University to give an address. Many people lined up on the sides of the street as his limousine made its way to the university. They were protesting his lack of concern for human rights such as his regard for the state of Tibet and the 1989 student protest in Tiananmen Square. Still, there were a few people who gave support for President Zemin by waving the Chinese flag and singing the Chinese national anthem.

President Zemin has been scrutinized by the media here in the United States for these abuses — as he well should be. But the way in which he has been attacked by the U.S. media and government has been hypocritical.

The U.S. government wants President Zemin to apologize for the Chinese government's response to Tiannamen Square, where many students were massacred and many more were put in jail. The U.S. government wants to have a better relationship with China in terms of trade, but that can only happen if President Zemin addresses these issues to the liking of the U.S. government. After the little chat that President Clinton and President Zemin had, I find it highly unlikely that it will happen since President Zemin has stated to President Clinton that the Tiannamen Square incident could not be avoided. President Clinton did not like his answer.

If President Zemin proposed to the U.S. government that they had to address the issues of slavery in order for relations to be better between China and the United States, what do you think the United States would do?

Lilian Chan

I don't believe that the U.S. government has the right to give President Zemin ultimatums and demands because it's not as if the United States is all pure and good either. Just over a century ago, the United States believed in the enslavement of human beings — particularly those of African descent. If President Zemin proposed to the U.S. government that they had to address the issues of slavery in order for relations to be better between China and the United States, what do you think the United States would do? A while back, President Clinton was asked to apologize to African–Americans for the enslavement of their ancestors. President Clinton skirted over the issue and never addressed it. In short, he didn't make a public apology.

There have also been protests against President Zemin concerning his mistreatment of the people of Tibet. The people have freedom of religion, but what they really want is freedom from China. The United States isn't innocent from this matter either. The U.S. government's treatment of Native Americans has been really bad, to say the least. Has the United States ever made restitution to the Native American people for taking their lands and for killing their people? Sure, the Native American people were given plots of land here and there, called reservations, but it hasn't been enough.

Not enough amends have been given to the Native American people. They are underrepresented in our society. Except with regards to the names of sports teams, such as the Cleveland Indians — which I don't think should be looked at as a step ahead in terms of being portrayed in the United States. Who would want their culture, ethnicity or race to be used for the naming of a team? I don't believe that people would be too happy over teams named after other peoples such as the Alabama Africans, the Houston Hispanics, the Jersey Jews or the Atlanta Asians. People would go into an uproar if that happened, but since they're just Native Americans, who cares?

If the president of the United States can't even address this country's own issues, what gives him the right to make demands on another country for their poor human rights? I'm not saying that the United States can't criticize, but what I am saying is that the government shouldn't be so arrogant as to believe it has the right to make demands.

Counting Crows reach the crowd

To the Editor:

I would like to comment on the review of the Counting Crows concert that appeared in Monday's Collegian. I think that to write such a negative review about a great band like this means you really don't know anything what the music is all about. Take Adam Duritz, yes he is depressing. All his songs are about leaving California coming to California, raining and breaking up with someone. Adam is someone who sings about things most of us have written down in our diaries. Take "Raining in Baltimore," the most amazing ballad of the evening. I know I have been in situations like that, being far away from loved ones and he touches on those moments. I don't think his somber mood was overkilled. Counting Crows music is like reading an autobiography of the life of Adam Duritz and I personally find it intriguing and relatable.

As for the crowd, I don't know where you were, but where I was standing there were very energetic people. Everyone around me knew all the words to all the songs and it created a fun atmosphere. That is what a Counting Crows concert is all about. It's like a roller coaster ride of emotions, he goes from jumping around in "A Murder of One" to the melancholy of "Omaha" to the down side of "A Long December." I enjoyed the concert very much. This is the second time I have seen the Counting Crows and both shows were very amazing. Obviously you don't understand the music and really looked at the concert on a superficial level to have reviewed it so poorly. For the record, I would once like to see a positive review of anything in this paper. It doesn't seem like you like anything you see or hear anyway.

To the Editor:

When I opened my Collegian Monday and began to read Marty Keane's review of the Counting Crows concert, I was surprised to say the least. With all due respect Mr. Keane, are you sure you attended the concert on Saturday, or were you just standing around in the hallway watching it on a monitor? I realize we're all entitled to our opinion, and that your review is nothing more than your own opinion, but I think your review of the show was excessively harsh. Judging by the fact that Matt Malley's picture was incorrectly identified as Dan Vickrey, you or someone else at the Collegian aren't terribly familiar with the band members, nor, I suspect, with their music.

From where I was sitting, the audience seemed very receptive to the excellent new lyrics added to "Mr. Jones." Where you saw dullness in the less raucous songs, I think many fans found tranquility and the spectrum of energy that made the show work so well.

I was pleased to see that you appreciated the brilliance of "Raining in Baltimore," which was certainly one of the best songs of the night. However, I think you may have missed the whole point of what it is that separates the song from the masses and makes it so amazing. If you take the time to really sit down and listen to it, it is the so-called "one-dimensional" lyrics along with Adam's emotion that turn the song from a clever tune into a gem of epic proportions.

I realize that not everyone can like the same music, and I don't claim to speak for everyone who went to the concert. I think, though, that when you came to your conclusion that the concert was bland, you forgot to read your own review and take the many positives of the performance into account.

More to life's worth than freedom to smoke

To the Editor:

I am not an advocate of what Hussein Ibish calls the "nanny-state approach." I do not support the proposed ban on smoking in Amherst bars, nor do I support the proposed campus alcohol ban. I believe his Nov. 3 editorial, "The devil's weed," contains flaws which seriously undermine the credibility of his thesis. Firstly, by stating that drinking and smoking "...are among the elements of life that make it most worth living...," he does more than make an inaccurate generalization, he creates a very difficult task for himself, and it is one that he leaves incomplete. While it may be safe to say that freedom of individual choice is an essential element of life's worth, to say the same thing of specifics such as drinking and smoking requires discussion and proof which Mr. Ibish does not offer. Secondly, his arguments can be made without religious overtones. But since Mr. Ibish does draw religion into the discussion, I find his citation of only Puritanism to be a reductionary easy-escape route. Given the current popular culture backlash against authority and Christianity, his choice to place his discussion in the context of Puritanism seems to be guided more by the safe bet of rallying the pop-culture masses than by true intellectual integrity. This approach disregards the fact that other major world religions, such as Buddhism and Islam, explicitly speak against substance abuse.

Finally, given the large percentage of college students that drink, coupled with the prevalence of on-campus peer pressure, Mr. Ibish's charge that the anti-alcohol and smoking movements are agents of mediocrity and conformity borders on inanity. When in future Monday morning lecture halls I listen to my peers discussing how much they drank, how much they threw up, and how much they do or do not remember the person who they slept with over the weekend, I believe that I will be rather hard pressed to perceive these acts as meritorious achievements of triumphant individualism and nonconformity. I hope that Mr. Ibish seriously considers re-charting the course of this series, and heads toward intelligent evaluation and discussion, lest he find himself floating adrift, pandering to his own "culture of mediocrity."

Categories are not for everyone

"Where are you from?"
-"Vermont."
"No, really. Where are you from?"
"Burlington, Vermont."
"Before that, where were you from?"
"I've always been from Burlington."
"Oh."

To overuse a cliché, if I had a nickel for every time I've had this conversation, I would be richer than Bill Gates.

I don't particularly take offense when I get into a conversation of this sort with people. I just figure that I confuse them — the accentless person of origin undetermined. People are just trying to figure out who I am.

Seema Gangatirkar

Society, in general, feels the inherent need to put others into categories. We like to know who and what we're dealing with. There's an element of safety for some people if they can immediately drop an individual into a group of some kind. If it sounds harsh, unfortunately it's a reality and pretty much the only way people know how to interact with other people.

It doesn't matter what the group is: it could be Catholics, red–haired people or bungee jumpers. Just get thee into a category and stay there.

The problem arises when a person cannot be easily defined — or doesn't allow themselves to be just placed in a category of some kind.

It would be so easy to go around and point to a person and say, "That person's favorite color is red. So everything I do that is related to this person is based upon my knowledge of people who like red."

Silly? Maybe. But that's the way we are. We like to take the easy way out when it comes to dealing with anyone new we meet.

I don't mind being put into a category — as long as it doesn't involve a hyphen.

There are many people who have embraced the hyphen. These days there are Italian–American communities, German–American... the list goes on. But what does that hyphen really mean?

To me, it's another way of placing people into rigid boxes that force a certain identity (not to mention stereotypes) to be placed on people.

On a census form, I would have to mark off the box marked "Asian" for race. And having been born in this country, I claim the right of citizenship.

But I would never describe myself as an Asian–American. I am not denying my Indian heritage; I acknowledge it as a part of who I am. But the term "Asian–American" doesn't encompass everything about me and hence, I'd rather not use the term.

Hyphenating yourself into a category may be a point of pride for people; certainly many are proud of whatever heritage they have come from — be it European, Asian or African. And the hyphen also provides that easy categorization that we all long for.

Many people see ancestry as a key point of definition — the easiest way to categorize a person. Where our people originally came from has something to do with our genetic make-up and depending on how far back one's ancestors arrived in this country, the extent to which cultural traditions are practiced.

But where our genes originated don't have so much to do with who we are — they only make up a part of what we are.

Defining ourselves or others based on a narrow perspective of cultural identity can restrict the way we choose to interact with others.

As a definition, "Asian–American" holds many connotations — some of them good, some bad. The same could be said of any such classification scheme.

Hyphens provide one way of defining yourself; it's not the only way.

Identity is what we make of ourselves. If someone chooses to define himself as a Polish–American, he has every right to that. But is that title everything he is about? Would everything he feels come from knowing he was a Polish–American?

That pesky hyphen is part of what makes an individual unique — but for the most part, it doesn't say everything there is to know about a person.

We owe much to the cultural traditions we come from and celebrate; at the same time, we cannot forget the environment we live in or the experiences which shape our motivations.

In order to move away from classifying people, we need to stop thinking in narrow terms about ourselves. Only in that way is it possible to incorporate all the different facets into an individual identity.

Jiang leaves on positive note

By Charles Hutzler
Associated Press

BEIJING — Jiang Zemin grinned for the cameras, basking one last time in the flattering press provided by China's state media during his trip to the United States.

Back in Beijing, with American protesters and congressional critics left behind, Jiang could safely relish his successful turn as a world leader courted by American business and accepted by President Clinton.

But with the focus on form, not substance, luster from Jiang's achievement abroad is likely to fade. China's most important U.S. mission since U.S.-China relations derailed during the 1989 Tiananmen Square crackdown merely papered over persistent divisions.

"We will have 18 months to 2 years of positive developments in Chinese-U.S. relations," said Ronald Montaperto, a China specialist at National Defense University in Washington.

After that, he said, the same disputes over human rights, trade and especially Taiwan will overtake the goodwill Jiang bought. On these issues, China made no concessions.

Jiang refused to set free imprisoned political prisoners and appeared intractable about holding talks with the Dalai Lama, the exiled leader of Chinese-held Tibet. Both were good-faith gestures sought by the Clinton administration.

When asked at Harvard University about the Tiananmen crackdown, Jiang appeared to indirectly acknowledge "mistakes" in the government's handling of the protests. His foreign minister soon set the record straight: The comment did not pertain to Tiananmen. A trade mission Jiang dispatched ahead of his trip bought U.S. goods, mostly Boeing aircraft, worth $4 billion — a light dent in China's ballooning trade surplus, projected to top $40 billion this year.

On Taiwan, the former U.S. ally China menaced with missiles and war games last year, Jiang got Clinton to renew a pledge acknowledging Beijing's claim to the island. The state media widely reported that vow.

A deal to allow the U.S. nuclear industry to build reactors in China — one of the summit's few gains for the Clinton administration — was scarcely mentioned. The agreement was forged only after China promised not to share nuclear technology with Iran.

For the Chinese, the pomp was the message: Jiang standing beside Clinton on the White House lawn and red-carpet welcomes by U.S. business executives in New York and Los Angeles.

Jiang appeared happy and tired at a brief welcoming ceremony yesterday in Beijing's Great Hall of the People. There, he shook hands with Premier Li Peng and other leaders, and he shouted "very good trip" to nearby reporters, using the English he put to good use in the United States.

Since 1989, when Chinese tanks and troops fired on democracy activists in Tiananmen Square, human rights has been at the forefront in Washington. "The question has always been whether China can construct a new foundation for the relationship," said Wang Jisi, a U.S. expert at the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences. Even if the once-heady highs that Chinese-U.S. relations enjoyed in the 1980s are gone, Wang said that future lows might not be so damaging.

Clinton's civil rights officer nominee criticized for views

By Darlene Superville
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Clinton's nomination of Bill Lann Lee as the nation's top civil rights officer appeared in serious trouble yesterday after a key Senate Republican criticized the Los Angeles lawyer's views on affirmative action.

Several Republicans on the Senate Judiciary Committee said they also opposed Lee, casting further doubt over whether the panel will approve the nomination this week and forward it to the full Senate for confirmation.

The White House said it had no plans to withdraw the nomination. Officials arranged a strategy meeting with civil rights groups and accused the Senate of playing political games with Clinton's appointments.

Judiciary Committee Chairman Orrin Hatch, (R-Utah), told the Senate that Lee's devotion to "preserving constitutionally suspect race-conscious policies that ultimately sort and divide citizens by race" made him an unacceptable choice for the post.

Hatch, along with other Republicans and conservatives, wants to end affirmative action and opposed the administration's position in a case challenging California's Proposition 209, which recently was upheld by a federal appeals court. The Supreme Court declined Monday to hear further appeals in the case.

The Utah Republican also is the sponsor of similar anti-affirmative action legislation that would apply to the federal government.

Lee, the Los Angeles-based counsel for the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund since 1988, supported the administration's arguments against Proposition 209 and disagreed with the Supreme Court ruling several years ago in a much-watched affirmative action case.

Hatch said Lee's answers to questions from the committee suggested that his "understanding of the nation's civil rights laws is sufficiently cramped and distorted to compel my opposition."

"The assistant attorney general must be America's civil rights law enforcer, not the civil rights ombudsman for the political left," he said.

Clinton said he was disappointed in Hatch because "everybody who knows Bill Lann Lee knows he is superbly qualified." He added that the White House would begin to lobby senators for their support.

"How could anybody in good conscience vote against him if they believe our civil rights laws ought to be enforced?" he said. "That is the question we will be pressing to every senator without regard to party."

Senate Democratic leader Tom Daschle of South Dakota said that Hatch did a "real disservice to Mr. Lee," but that it didn't necessarily kill the nomination.

"There are times when other issues have been proclaimed dead and we've been able to revive them, and I'm hopeful we can do that with the Lee nomination," Daschle told reporters.

Clinton has had previous problems with Congress over his choices for this particular Justice Department post. He was forced to withdraw Lani Guinier, his first choice, in 1993 when faced with a GOP filibuster in what then was a Democratic-controlled Congress. Republicans opposed her views on affirmative action and derided her as a "quota queen."

The Senate confirmed his second choice, Boston attorney Deval Patrick. He returned to private practice this year after three years in the post.

Others nominees who have encountered Republican resistance include Labor Secretary Alexis Herman, Transportation Secretary Rodney Slater, Dr. David Satcher, the surgeon general nominee, and Nancy Ann Min DeParle, the nominee to become administrator of the Health Care Finance Agency.

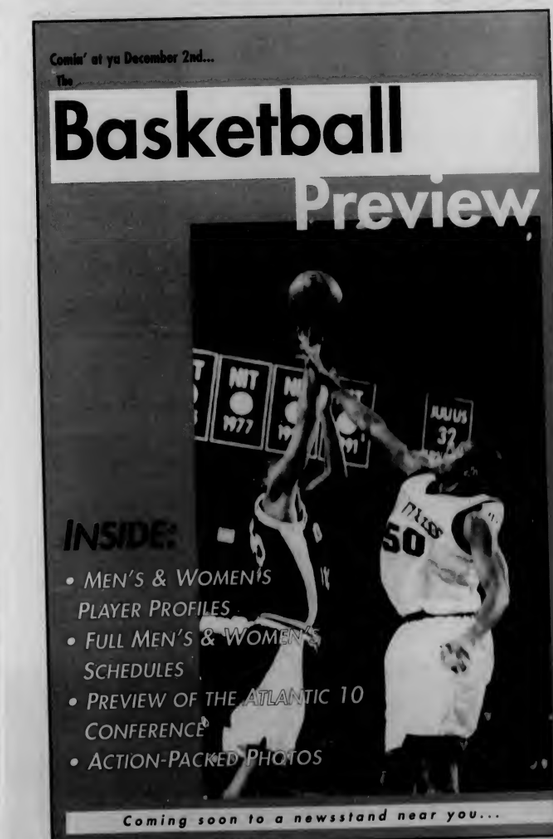
But all of Clinton's choices for the civil rights post share a bond — employment by the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, which is disliked by conservatives for its staunch defense of affirmative action.

"We're gratified that Senator Hatch is standing up for the principle of equality under the law and opposing the nomination," said Clint Bolick, vice president for litigation at the Institute for Justice, a conservative group that opposes Lee. "We feel confident that if the administration persists with this nomination it will be defeated."

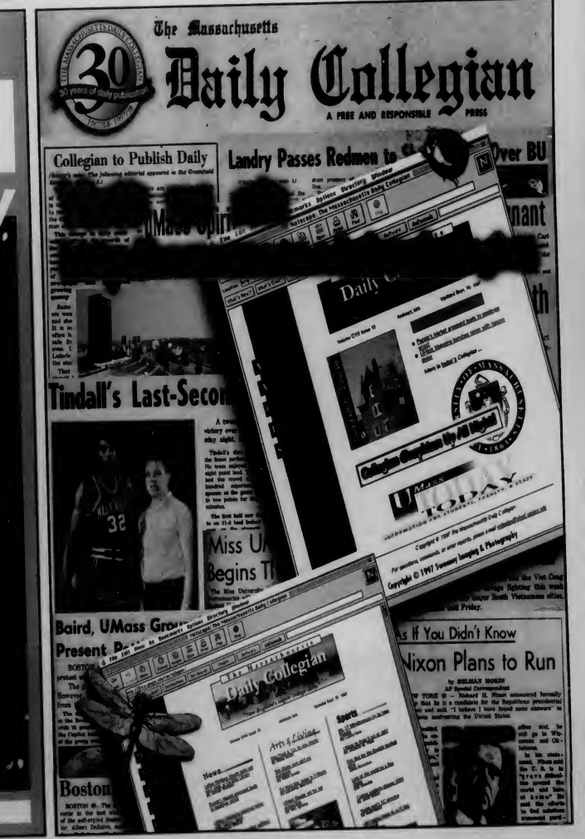
Teamsters agree to pay $3.7 million

By Kevin Galvin
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Teamsters have agreed to pay at least half the estimated $7.4 million cost for a rerun of the union's federally supervised election, a union spokesman confirmed yesterday. Negotiations with the Justice Department over exactly which costs will fall to the Teamsters are continuing, but spokesman Matt Witt said the union will pay at least $3.7 million.



The federal government picked up the nearly $20 million tab for last year's contest between Teamsters President Ron Carey and challenger James P. Hoffa. But Carey's slim win was thrown out and a new race ordered Aug. 22.



Carey's campaign manager and two consultants pleaded guilty to a conspiracy that funneled union treasury money into Carey's campaign. Another court officer is determining whether Carey should be eligible for the rerun.

The federal government paid to conduct the election under the terms of a 1989 consent decree that the Teamsters signed with the Justice Department. To avoid a racketeering suit, the Teamsters agreed to hold rank-and-file elections and fight organized crime's influence within the union.

The union paid for the first union-wide vote in 1991, and had expected the government to pay for the total cost of the second contest, including the rerun. But Congressional Republicans sought to block the Justice Department from spending any more on the process.

"The Bush administration agreed to pay the costs to ensure a fair election and an end to mob control of the union," Witt said. "To ensure a fair election, we're going to pay costs that the government had promised to pay."

Listed below are 44 campus-wide committees which have seats specifically designated for students. Most of these seats are not filled at present. Undergraduates interested in serving on these committees need to contact Student Government Association (SGA) at 545-0341.

Recently, the Faculty Senate approved a proposal to provide one-credit practicum credit per semester for undergraduates who paticipate as student representatives on any of the twenty Faculty Senate Committees and Councils. Members of the Student Government Association are currently exploring ways to expand this credit option for students serving on all other campus-wide committees as well.

ARTS & LIVING

The Cure & Ween fly high, Jerky Boys crash

GALORE
The Cure
Fiction/Elektra

Since forming in the mid 1970s, The Cure have made dreamy synth-pop out of art-rock's silliest cliches through Robert Smith's ability to merge the brain of Jim Morrison and the soul of the Pillsbury Doughboy.

After releasing the singles compilation Standing on a Beach/Staring at the Sea in 1986, cited by Rolling Stone as one of the "best albums ever made," the kings of mainstream Goth have returned with another Greatest Hits album, Galore (Fiction/Elektra), which is a collection of their last 17 singles along with a new track, "Wrong Number" — a song recorded in London last summer which features a guest performance by ex-Tin Machine guitarist and David Bowie collaborator Reeves Gabrels.

Trax On Trax Off

The Cure have always been a singles band and the running order of Galore works well as it serves up each single off their last five albums in chronological order. The songs themselves are almost all exclusively hits, from the touching pain of "Friday I'm In Love" to "Just Like Heaven"'s pretty personal angst to the surprisingly uplifting "Mint Car."

What Galore does above all else is highlight The Cure's main strengths, namely communicating despondency through their slow, moody percussion-driven dirges and Smith's sad lyrics. The 17 singles represented here each emphatically point toward why The Cure have been one of the most influential post-punk bands in the last decade, with everyone from the Smashing Pumpkins to the Cardigans citing them as primary inspirations for making music.

Simply put, it's an essential album to any collection of alternative rock. A (Marty Keane)

THE MOLLUSK
Ween
Elektra

In a style that only a few can reproduce, Ween once again cranks out an inventive album that is undoubtedly characteristic of their previous work. Taking simple repetitive beats and wisely using them, Ween's childish rhymes and rhythms create a playful sound reminiscent of a walk through Alice's Wonderland. Eerie vocals on "Mutilated Lips" and "Cold Blows the Wind" give an enigmatic, dark and cloudy feeling to the album while tunes like "The Mollusk" are more on the light and fluffy side.

Skillfully alternating slow, smooth ballads with loud, chiming songs, Ween captures your attention from the get- go and sends the listener's imagination on a wild ride. Not stopping until there's no more music to be dealt out, The Mollusk (Elektra) leaves you wondering exactly what's in store next.

Definitely an original, underrated band, Ween's newest effort might very well be their best to date. B+ (Alexandria Lipka)

THE JERKY BOYS 4
The Jerky Boys
Mercury

With sales of their last three albums reaching nearly four million copies, the Jerky Boys have become well-established as the reigning kings of the illustrious art of the prank phone call. Their fourth album, however, does not nearly reach the regal status of its predecessors. Clearly, the material has been recycled one time too many.

COURTESY TONI NICHOLS

Ween's latest release, The Mollusk, could be their best to date.

Many of the favorite characters are still around, including Frank Rizzo, Sol Rosenberg and Jack Tors, but they are seriously lacking the freshly sardonic humor that made them so funny in the first place.

The Jerky Boys 4 (Mercury) consists of 24 new tracks and a special song remix at the album's close. Titles such as "Sol's Thermometer Mishap," "Spider Monkey" and "Bacon" only hint at the inane dialog that follows. The Jerky Boys carry their obsession on with humiliation, profanity and anal penetration to new, mind–blowing lows with this most recent batch of calls. Included is their attempt to further victimize the victim through classified ads that they place, requiring the person to call in their own embarrassing fate.

What began as an innocent prank has taken an almost cruel turn as the Jerky Boys try desperately to grasp at the final straws of humor that once existed in their original brand of performance art by focusing on the degradation of the victim rather than the entertainment of the listener.

The Jerky Boys 4 barely elicits a giggle, much less the laughter that one hopes for with a comedy album. D (Elsa Allen)

GOOD FEELING
Travis
Independiente/Epic

What is it with British pop music these days? In the last few years, seemingly everything they touch turns to gold. For anyone doubting the prominence of Britpop these days, one only needs to take a listen to the debut album from Travis, who'll be opening for one of rock's finest live bands, Ben Folds Five, at Pearl Street tonight in Northampton.

Having recently completed a European tour opening for Oasis, Travis has hit the States with Good Feeling (Independiente/Epic). The album's title says it all. Like Supergrass, Travis is a new breed of British bands where musical substance has wisely taken precedence over pretentiousness. "U16 Girls," "More Than Us" and the hilarious "Falling Down" are each catchy in their own right; sure you've heard these sounds somewhere, but it's too difficult to pin down exactly where — a telltale sign of a good band.

Another promising effort from the Brits. Now if only we could come up with something better than Everclear, everything in this world would be right again. Wishful thinking, I know. B+ (M.K.)

Hardcore & punk scene taken for granted by fans

Adam Dlugacz

First of all, after months of waiting, the Hallraker CD is finally out on Psyke records. I haven't heard it yet, at least not in its official format, but trust me, it rocks. Look for a review of it in next week's column. If you have it and are listening to it repeatedly, as you should be, check out the backing vocals.

Some other new releases are: The Get Up Kids, Braid split 7", Braid 7", 25 Ta Life Lp on Another Planet Records, Floorpunch Lp on Equal Vision Records (it's a compilation of their previously released 7" and their demo), and Maximum Penalty Lp on Blackout Records. I haven't had a chance to hear any of the CD's because I'm broke, but I do own the 7"s, though my roommate's record player is having technical difficulties. I will try to have some reviews for you by next week.

Converge has signed with Equal Vision Records. Elliot has signed with Revelation Records and should be releasing an LP sometime in December.

On Friday, Nov. 14, there's an Animal Rights Benefit show in the basement of Van Meter featuring Hallraker, Piebald, Cave In, and Just About Done. On Saturday, Nov. 15 the Misfits, Sick Of It All, and H2O will be playing at Pearl Street. On Nov. 21 in Greenough is Six Going On Seven. NewJerseyFairPlan, Huguenots, Just About Done, and Tipping Canoe will be playing.

Throughout all of this year I have been strictly writing scene information for all of my faithful readers and have stayed away from my commentaries (which might be why I haven't received any hate mail this semester), but alas the time has come for me to open my trap.

It seems to me that a lot of people who are involved in this whole hardcore punk scene (and all of its subdivisions) too often take what we have for granted. Rather then celebrating the fact that there is a scene where you can go see five or six bands for under $10, where bands can put out Ep's or Lp's on their friends labels, a place where you can yourself, a place where you can escape from the drudgery from everyday life, still most of us choose to complain. Think about it, how many times do you pick up a zine and the only thing you see in the letters are people complaining about something? I'm not saying I'm innocent of this, I'm just saying maybe it's time we stopped taking hardcore for granted.

This goes beyond not complaining about every little petty thing that occurs, it's about really opening your mind. I can't believe how many times I hear kids tell me how open- minded they are and then claim that all bands from New York are tough guy bands or maybe how certain bands aren't hardcore because of some of their beliefs. Hardcore and open–mindedness is about accepting opposing viewpoints from your own. I'm not saying you have to agree with everything or like every band I'm just saying give them a chance. Don't just go to a show and stand outside because you've never heard of the band before, don't just dislike a band because they play a certain style of music. Try new things or new styles.

The other thing we all need to stop doing is imposing rules on kids. I went to the Space in Worcester, a great place, and was stunned to see a sign saying dancing wasn't allowed. How many times do you open Heartattack and see bands slagged because their politics (I'm talking scene) differ from the PC politics of that zine. If we oppose rules on the scene we are simply creating a place that is no different then any other, only with better music.

What I'm trying to say is we have a great scene that has the potential to be much better. All we have to do is learn to relax a little bit and be more concerned with what is going on, on stage (when you can see the band, but I won't go there) and what is really going on in your head and in your heart before we jump to conclusions. Let's work on really breaking down the walls instead of building them up.

Larry, Larry Bird is the Pacers Word; Pitino big on Celts

Who woulda thunk it, the New Jersey Nets in first place, the World Champion Chicago Bulls not being able to cope with the new Pitino System, and Mr. Ex–Celtic himself Larry Bird actually not leading his team to victory?

We are now a whopping three games into the '97–'98 NBA season. Now don't get me wrong — a lot has been proven in this first week and a half of ball, but there is a long way to go and a lot more to prove.

• First, I would like to address the highest paid coach in the game today... Boston's very own Rick Pitino. Consider this: you have coached only two seasons in your NBA career, and that was with long–time Boston rival, the New York Knicks.

After impressively rebuilding the New York organization, you decide to drop down to the college ranks, taking the head coach position at the University of Kentucky. You coach there for eight years, rebuilding the team, making three trips to the Final Four and capturing the 1996 national championship. All for a total of eight years going 219–50.

You then decide to step back up to the professional ranks, taking the head coaching position with those ever–so–needy Boston Celtics. After a complete overhaul during and as a result of the preseason, you step into your first NBA season in a little over eight years.

And here are your 1997–98 Celtics... the average age of the Celtics is a ripe old 22, making them the youngest team in the NBA. The average NBA experience on the team? Approximately 2.3 years. The number of players who played for the Celtics last season is only five. The number of Celtics that would still be in college if they stayed for senior year is three, with three from Kentucky.

Then there is the task... to take the Pitino System against the world champion Chicago Bulls in the season opener.

I would just like to say — Congrats Celtics. Despite having all the odds against them, Pitino's Celtics pulled through with an impressive season opening victory.

Defeating the Bulls not only proved that Michael Jordan and his Bulls are human, but it also showed what Rick Pitino and his Celtics are capable of just about anything. If Pitino's rebuilding record continues as it has in the past, I think it's safe to say the Fleet Center rafters will be adding a new addition to the family in the next few years or so.

• Sticking with the Celtic Pride, let's talk about Indiana's own Larry Bird. The former Celtic great experienced his first regular season game at the coaching position when the Indiana Pacers took on my home town and now first–place New Jersey Nets.

Coach Bird's debut was not as successful as he and Indiana had hoped it would be. In this season opening match–up, the Nets took their first step towards the first place spot in the Atlantic Division by defeating Larry Bird and his Indiana Pacers.

But hey, don't sleep on the Pacers. Last season they were plagued with injuries and a coach (Larry Brown) who knew he was gone at the season's end. In light of all this, the Pacers saw they were going nowhere last season, and you can consider them a playoff team who took an early vacation. Well, now there back.

Despite the health issues, especially regarding 7–foot–4– inch center Rik Smits, coach Bird has a lot to be enthused and excited about when it comes to his new team and his new job. Indiana is armed with Chris Mullin (a BIG plus) and then of course there is Mr. Give–me–the–ball under pressure, Reggie Miller. I think it is safe to say as long as Bird plays his cards right, the Pacers will be back in title contention.

urally he got excited. (Thought he could score chicks at Hobart.) So Uncle Bill left a message on my machine with a pick.

Eagles over the Cowboys.

Hey, it happened. But apparently Uncle Bill didn't know his favorite nephew (I'd be yours too) writes about college football, not the NFL.

He's still cool, though. I once saw Uncle Bill play a mean Indian in a Meredith family production of the "Village People" a while back.

Now, if that doesn't qualify you as an expert on football, nothing does.

Booty Schwag of the Week Award...

You know, Alabama had Bear Bryant. They had Kenny Stabler. They had Forrest Gump.

They lost to Louisiana Tech 26–20 on Saturday. Some would argue that the Bear is currently rolling in his grave. I disagree on two accounts.

First, it's impossible to roll in a grave, especially if you've been dead for 15 years.

Second, I don't think Bryant would even acknowledge he used to coach there after losing to Louisiana Tech, best known for getting laughed by kids at Georgia Tech. (Like, "Hey Tommy. Don't worry about failing trig. You could always transfer to... La. Tech").

I'll hold for slight chuckles. I imagine the Tide have heard worse this week.

perfection.

"Both players are quiet leaders," Shea said. "Sharon leads by example, and has an uncanny work ethic. Amy has very high expectations of herself. She's done a great job back there."

After Friday's loss to West Chester, which cost UMass the top seed in the Atlantic 10 Tournament, the Minutewomen rebounded during Sunday's typhoon in Philadelphia, as the defense preserved a 1–0 victory over St. Joseph's. Realizing that their team was in desperate need to enter the A–10 Tournament with a win behind them, both Ott and Hughes powered the defensive unit to a shutout.

"It's our job to stay focused. St. Joe's was a wake–up call, and we needed to get ourselves back on track," Ott said. "Defense is a crucial part of any game. You can't score a goal and then let the ball come back down. It's our job to keep the momentum on our side."

Although both players admit that three coaches in three years has been a tough transition, they feel that they have benefited from the variety of coaching knowledge.

"It's a really hard adjustment to make at first," Hughes said. "You don't know what to expect. You just have to not think about it and make the most of it. I've taken something from each coach."

Ott agreed, but feels that the transition between 1996 coach Pam Hixon and her former player and protegé Shea was actually smooth.

"It's a learning experience, and it's hard to adjust to each coaching style," said Ott, a Pennsylvania native and former Perkiomen Valley High School star. "Coach Hixon and coach Shea are a lot alike, though. In this case, the apple doesn't fall far from the tree, I guess."

Another major change witnessed by Ott and Hughes has been their home field, which moved from the grass surface at Totman to the turf of Garber Field.

"The switch from grass to turf made the team more excited about playing this fall," Hughes said, who was a star at Barnstable High School. "I think the new field shows the start of a new team. We still have to make the transition from grass to turf, but I think the new field will get us some great recruits in the future."

As the Minutewomen prepare to host the A–10's this weekend, both Hughes and Ott watch the waning moments of their collegiate careers wind down to a precious few. In their final season, both seniors hope to leave UMass on a high note as the 1997 A–10 Champions.

"It's the type of feeling where you know it could be the last time you're out there [competing]," Ott said. "It's more of an emotional game. There's a lot more tension out on the field, which can actually be good for the team."

At the conclusion of the 1997 campaign, both Hughes and Ott will leave behind a program which has occupied a combined nine years of their lives. In addition to their excellence on the playing field, both defensive veterans have made their mark academically at UMass, having been named to the 1996 All A–10 Academic team.

"Academics is a close number one and a half on my list, but field hockey is still number one, though," Ott said, who is a sociology major. "Grades are very important to me. There is life after field hockey."

made the trip to Jacksonville for the game.

The scene that surrounded us was jaw–dropping, with car horns blaring and voices blasting out "Go Dogs!" All and all, the whole experience could be encapsulated in one encounter we had as an emotionally consumed group.

As we walked down Broad Street, a man in his mid–30's and his 7–year–old daughter skipped lightly hand–in–hand, and while lapping us twice, they sang together, "Isn't it great to be a Georgia Bulldog!"

In this instance, I would have to say — yes.

Amidst the din of screaming 20–somethings, a man and his daughter enjoyed the school spirit together... described as "cute" by a few of the Minutewomen, and okay, myself, too.

This is what Div. I football can bring to a university.

Yet, after a brief moment of silence, a new song emanated from their mouths a few feet behind us.

"Isn't it great to be a Massachusetts Minuteman!"

We all joined together in laughter, as they remarked on the UMass on the back of their jackets. The next thing you know, we were wrapped up in the spirit of the occasion. It was an amazing scene. But, in this instance, I would have to say — no, it is not great to be a Massachusetts Minuteman.

After a 51–13 loss to Hofstra on Saturday, before an anemic crowd of 2,510, I would have to say there were more people celebrating the Florida win in downtown Athens than the few who showed up at McGuirk Stadium.

But, you can't fault the Massachusetts football team for the recent demise of a once–storied Div. I–AA program. Sure, they do get the most support concerning personnel, but with a loss of a little over a million dollars this year, their 2–7 record is a concise metaphor of the Div. I–AA dead end.

A factor concerning the team's lack of quality is any effort by Athletic Director Bob Marcum to make the jump to Div. I becomes stymied by the Faculty Senate, and any other group on campus. Except for a few examples, reality states that Div. I–AA football is a graveyard — go and ask Boston University. But, I'm not here to address the specifics of the Div. I football debate at our university, but I'm here to show what it could bring to our university.

Would you like a new student recreational facility?

Unless you're a fan of gothic architecture, the Boyden Dungeon just doesn't have a glowing effect on me — even with the renovations. Basically, it's old and decrepit.

With the help of funding from a Div. I football program, the Ramsey Student Center has recently been completed at Georgia, and no lie, you can not fit it in into the 86,000–plus confines of Sanford Stadium. Here's a list of amenities: rock–climbing walls, indoor track, an Olympic swimming and diving facility, a 3,000 seat volleyball auditorium, 16 racquetball courts, two multi–purpose indoor soccer floors and it goes on and on from there.

Simply put, it's the largest of its kind in the nation.

This is what Div. I football can bring to a university.

A jump to Div. I football is not only going to help the athletic programs on campus, but it will help us as students. Sure, the money put into the jump will reap bigger financial losses in the short run, but in the long run, the revenue created by possibly taking on teams like Michigan — or, Georgia — on an annual basis will reap bigger benefits.

Hey, if you can elaborate on any other viable option to improve the facilities on this campus, you can also run for the presidency. Really. No kidding.

In my four years here at this university, I have watched the facilities for both student and athlete alike stumble into mediocrity. The Mullins Center is nice (but we really needed that), and another glimmer of hope is the renovation of Garber Field (yeah, we really needed that, too).

But, as I watch the historically successful Minutewomen play their home games on a glorified high school field, and the historically successful Minutemen play a glorified high school level of football, I become afraid — very afraid — for the future of my state university.

School spirit? From students and non–students alike, teams we can all support and be proud of, and facilities that cater to us as students.

Now, that is what should be brought to our University.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You should make plans today, but they needn't be so detailed that you know what is going to happen every minute. Some improvisation is good.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — Today, you may be tempted to continue along a course of behavior that has proven to be only marginally successful for you in the past.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You are going to want to favor those who are in it because they love it. There is more to motivation at this time than mere profit.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — You may have a disagreement with a partner over one or two fundamental issues today. This needn't be a reason to stop working together.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — You can have someone else do the legwork today while you are front–and–center taking the heat. Together, you two can work wonders!

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — The halfway mark is approaching, and you may want to take sometime to assess your recent progress and decide where to go next.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You might receive more information today than you had expected, but you should be able to put it all to very good use before the day is out.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — A creative endeavor cannot be completed alone today. Engage the services of one or two people who share your interests and methods.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — You may be called upon to fill in for someone who is temporarily indisposed. Take care that you don't come on so strong that you're not asked back!

A–10 championship returns to UMass

Senior Rebecca Donaghue wins individual title for second year in a row, five place in league top 10

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

Oh, by the way, the Massachusetts women's cross country team won the Atlantic 10 championship for the third year in a row, and yeah, they accomplished that feat with the lowest point total in-conference tournament history.

If you do not get it yet, a low point total is good in cross country — you know, like the game of golf.

Amidst a wet and sloppy weekend for most of the sports on campus, the Minutewomen went figuratively five under–par at Bull Run Park in Centerville, Va., and powered themselves in wet and sloppy conditions for the 1997 A–10 title. UMass beat out St. Joseph's off of the strength of five finishers in the top 10, and senior Rebecca Donaghue's second straight individual championship title.

UMass	28
St. Joe's	48
Va. Tech.	66
URI	118
G.W.	187

Donaghue now joins Penn State's Wendy Wilson (1989– 90) as the only repeat winner of the annual event, and her individual victory helped bring the fifth out of the last seven A–10 championship titles back to the Pioneer Valley.

UMass' 28 point total outpaced St. Joe's 48 points, with Virginia Tech (66 points), Rhode Island (118) and George Washington (167). After Donaghue's first place time of 18:32.5, senior Christy Martin (4th, 18:50.4), freshman Melissa Henderson (6th, 19:04), junior Nicole Way (8th, 19:11.2) and sophomore Sarah Hirsch (9th, 19:12.1) rounded out the top 10 finishers in the A–10 — automatically earning them All–Conference honors.

UMass coach Julie LaFreniere, who was honored with her fifth A–10 Coach of the Year selection in seven years, was more than impressed with her team's gutsy performance in less–than–favorable conditions.

The team has focused all season on starting races hard, getting into a solid pace and then finishing them hard. That hard work in practice has now reaped the Minutewomen the benefits of another A–10 title.

"I think this is probably one of the best ones," LaFreniere said. "We were not supposed to win, and the last ranking I saw was Virginia Tech first, and us second. I haven't heard much about Va. Tech, so I just tried to get my kids ready for a tough meet.

"All fall, we've worked real hard on finishing our races with strength, and we've done a lot on the last quarter mile, working hard while we're tired. All that paid off, because they were just unbelievable, especially in the conditions."

Donaghue, Martin and senior Katie Greenia broke out into the first pack of six runners early in the race for UMass, and by the first–mile marker, the top three teams were represented in the lead pack.

By the two–mile mark, most of the Virginia Tech runners fell off the pace, and the Minutewoman trio held the lead. The rest of the UMass runners continued on behind in a tight pack, while Donaghue and St. Joe's Jen Rafferty separated themselves as the best of the lead pack.

The last uphill section of the race saw Donaghue fall off Rafferty's pace, due to the fact her spikeless running shoes could not find a grip in the murky Bull Run Park course conditions. LaFreniere feared that the sloppiness of the course could adversely affect her star senior, but Donaghue was able to keep herself in the race.

"Prior to the race, I told everybody that if you fall down, you get back up and start running again," LaFreniere said. "No one fell down, and I thought someone would. You don't think about stuff like that. This is a championship race, and you keep on going."

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Senior Christy Martin was one of five UMass finishers in the top 10 in the A–10 championships last weekend, taking fourth place with a time of 18:50.4.

That is what Donaghue and her teammates did, and Martin maintained her fourth position, while Greenia began to tighten up, falling back to a disappointing finish out of the top 10. Henderson, a finalist for A–10 Rookie of the Year, picked up her pace, and closed the gap in the final three–quarters of a mile with a steady conservation of energy for her sixth–place finish.

"I think Heather Whitmore [the A–10 Rookie of the Year from URI] will be looking at the back of Melissa's shoes next year," LaFreniere said. "She ran with a lot of guts, and a lot of heart. She put everything on the line."

Nicole Way, a converted triple–jumper, passed two St. Joe's runners in the final part of the race for her eighth place finish, with Sarah Hirsch following her lead for ninth place, outkicking their opponents.

Donaghue found her pace again at the top of the last hill, and closed the gap with a burst of speed, catching up on Rafferty to beat her by a three–second margin. The senior standout wrapped up a tough year, including bouts with bursitis in her heel and not being able to run on dry land until August, with an impressive come–from–behind win.

"Even I had doubts that Rebecca would catch her," LaFreniere said. "But once she decided to go, she flew right by her. I really wanted Rebecca to win that title for two years in a row, because she's had a real tough year. She's an incredible athlete.

"She's been through a lot, and now she's completely healthy. The whole meet was real cross country."

D–Day is revisited; The return of Uncle Bill, Bear Bryant

Some people are calling Saturday "D–Day." (I don't know really who, but that's what I hear). National championships are won and lost on days like this. Four unbeatens battle each other for the right to bitch about finishing second in the final season AP poll to Tom Osborne's Nebraska Cornhuskers.

Ahh, poll resentment. Must be November.

The Florida St.–North Carolina game in Chapel Hill is, supposedly, the game to unseat the ACC's reigning 300– pound gorilla, FSU. All the ingredients are there, they say, for one of the original ACC squads to unseat this ungrateful newcomer with its annoying habit of winning the conference title every year.

North Carolina seems to have it all this time around. A rock solid defense, probably the best in the country. A star quarterback, Oscar Davenport, who can be replaced by another star quarterback, Chris Keldorf, if deemed necessary. Home field advantage, cooler uniforms and the fact that most people are sick of FSU winning it every year just add to the feeling that UNC is due.

Luke Meredith on College Football

But does that mean they'll win the game? FSU is undefeated again, and they also have one of the best defenses in the country. (Of course you don't hear about them because they always have one of the best defenses in the country.)

The Michigan–Penn St. game isn't in that whole '90s resentment vein, because these two have hated each other for quite a while. This is for the Rose Bowl, the right to beat Washington and still finish second to— who else — Nebraska in the final polls.

Intriguing stuff. But the funny thing about both these teams is that they're both undefeated, but have seemingly been, not broken, all season. Michigan has a jacked defense, and Brian Griese isn't losing games for them.

Penn St. has barely beaten Minnesota and Northwestern. They seem to do just enough to win, which isn't enough to win a national title. But they could win back public sentiment with a big win over the Wolverines.

Of course, college football is about rivalries and great games, but the polls have set it up so it can be even cooler. See, great games aren't what impress the pollsters.

Blowouts are. And if we do see a blowout on Saturday, even though Penn St. will benefit, I'll still feel like someone missed the point.

Uncle Bill's Line of the Week...

You know, when Uncle Bill just got wind of the fact that he has been immortalized in the pages of New England's Largest College Daily, nat-

Stretch drive begins for women's volleyball

By Jamie Jee
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts volleyball team will travel to Kingston, R.I. today to take on the Rams at Keaney Gymnasium for a 6 p.m. match. The Minutewomen are coming off a split of their games last weekend, losing to Duquesne, but bouncing back to defeat St. Bonaventure, 3–0.

Senior outside hitter Lesley Nolan played well for UMass, collecting 23 digs and 12 kills against Duquesne, while in the process becoming UMass' all–time dig leader. Three other Minutewomen who added to the double–double list were sophomores Jill Meyers, Kari Hogancamp and Sarah Watters.

Looking to continue her well–rounded play today at the outside–hitter spot will be Watters, who had 10 kills in the win over St. Bonaventure.

Volleyball
Massachusetts vs. Rhode Island
@ URI, 7 p.m.

"I thought Sarah Watters played better offensively," UMass coach Bonnie Kenny said. "It was our lack of intensity and desire that killed us though."

The Minutewomen will have to bring plenty of both as they face a tough URI squad who brings a 12–2 Atlantic 10 record into today's contest, leaving them in second place behind front–runner Temple who has yet to lose in the A–10.

The Rams are riding high after a two match weekend sweep over the same teams the Minutewomen faced. URI downed St. Bonaventure by a 3–0 score, and Duquesne 3–2, and now have won three matches in a row, and 14 out of the last 16.

UMass will have to watch out for junior Nicole Becker, who's coming off a 24 kill weekend, while hitting .417 in the victory over Duquesne. A–10 Rookie of the Year candidate Cheri Melson will also try to make her presence felt, as she did last weekend with her solid all–around play.

The Rams defeated the Minutewomen earlier this season 3–1, but the match seemed to have been able to go either way when the teams had tied the match at one game apiece. In the third game, however, Rhode Island took control by going on a late scoring spree.

Hogancamp collected 15 kills and 19 digs in the loss.

"We have to move the ball around well with our hitters," Kenny said. "We have to learn to do that when it's tough."

UMass is currently in a three–way tie for fourth place in the A–10 with Duquesne and Virginia Tech. The Minutewomen will face the Hokies this Saturday when they head to Blacksburg, Va. The top four spots qualify for the Atlantic 10 Championship Tournament, held Nov. 28–29 in Dayton, Ohio.

"We're going to play all–out," said Watters. "Otherwise we'll be eating turkey in Amherst this year."

UM stumbles into mediocrity, while UGA leads pack

Jorma Kansanen

ATHENS, Ga. — At approximately 7:30 p.m. last Saturday night, the next best thing to meeting God, or Herschel Walker, occurred for the fans of Georgia football.

They beat Florida, 37–17.

In a scene reminiscent of anytime a SEC opponent beats another conference foe, the downtown of Athens erupted with euphoric delight, and the water of school spirit turned into the wine of celebration.

This is what Div. I football can bring to a university.

I know this happened, because I was there to see it.

Finding any excuse to make the trip to Athens for the No. 16 Massachusetts women's soccer team's two–match swing against Clemson and Georgia, I traveled to the Hospitality Belt for the NCAA implications involved last weekend.

In the time it took me and four of the Minutewomen to drive uptown for dinner Saturday night — approximately five minutes — Athens was bombarded with an exuberant horde of Georgia fans, from all walks and shades of life. For the two and a half days prior to the win over Florida, you could hear a pin drop on campus, because 40,000 of the Georgia faithful

Rocks of the Minutewomen defense

Senior backs Amy Ott and Sharon Hughes are the anchors

By Aaron M. Saykin
Collegian Staff

What a long, strange trip it has been for the dynamic duo of the Massachusetts field hockey team.

Despite adjusting to three different coaches in the past three seasons, and moving from the coziness of Totman Field to the state–of–the–art AstroTurf of Richard F. Garber field, senior backs Amy Ott and Sharon Hughes have managed to anchor the Minutewoman defense in extraordinary fashion for the second straight year.

On a team which is considered young, it comes as no surprise that the sweeper and center back of the UMass defense, respectively, have set the tone for their teammates with their fiery and complimentary play. As close friends and roommates off the field, Hughes and Ott seem to be in sync on the field as well.

"The longer you play with someone, the more you learn each other's moves and tendencies," first–year coach Patty Shea said of her senior stars. "They have very different styles, but they definitely mesh. You need that type of combination in your defense."

Cooperatively, the two combine to stymie nearly every Minutewomen opponent; individually, they offer contrasting styles, while at the same time, protecting the goal. As the center back of a solid UMass defense, Hughes carries the responsibility of advancing the ball to the midfielders, sparking the Massachusetts offense.

"Sharon is the connector from Amy to the offense," Shea said of the Centerville native. "She has the ability to play on both sides of the field."

As a fifth–year senior, and having been red–shirted her sophomore year with mononucleosis, Hughes offers a great deal of intelligence and silent leadership to her teammates. Similarly, Ott, whose team–high 10 assists have steadied the UMass penalty corner attack, also motivates the younger Minutewomen with her quest for

Body found in oil drum may be missing doctor

MEXICO CITY (AP) — Forensic scientists are close to identifying a body found stuffed into an oil drum as that of a plastic surgeon who operated on a powerful drug lord just before he died in his hospital bed.

The identification, which doctors said yesterday was imminent, would explain a longstanding mystery — the whereabouts of doctors who participated in an operation that cost drug lord Amado Carrillo Fuentes his life. It also would offer a motive for one of Mexico's most gruesome killings in years.

Police found three bodies Sunday on the side of the Mexico City–Acapulco highway. They were handcuffed, burned, blindfolded and had cables hung from their necks. The drums were partially filled with cement.

Roberto Godoy said his brother had disappeared from his Mexico City home 19 days ago. But Roberto Godoy had been unable to identify the decaying body.

Carrillo Fuentes, known as the "Lord of the Skies," headed the Juarez drug cartel and was believed to have been Mexico's most powerful drug lord.

Explosion at toy factory kills three, injures many

LOS ANGELES (AP) — A shrink-wrapping machine exploded at a downtown toy factory yesterday, killing three people and injuring at least 25.

The explosion at the Imperial Toy Corp. occurred about 3:20 p.m. It blew the windows out of the block-long building in an industrial area.

Three people were killed and at least 25 injured, said city fire Capt. Steve Ruda. Most of the injured were treated at the scene; some were taken to hospitals.

The cause of the explosion, which ignited a "flash-type fire" involved a shrink-wrapping machine that seals caps for toy cap pistols, said Bill Barnattre, a fire chief at the scene.

Fire inspector Alan Matsumoto said the blast was on the second floor in the manufacturing area of the building, where up to 10 people were working at the time. At least 150 employees were in building and all of them were accounted for.

Imperial Toy Corp. is licensed to produce toys for Universal Studios and Pepsi, among others.

UMass Commonwealth College granted $1 million in funding

By Tamar Carroll
Collegian Staff

The implementation of a Commonwealth (Honors) College at the University of Massachusetts is one step closer to reality with the recent appropriation of $1 million in funding for the College.

The Massachusetts Board of Higher Education voted at their last meeting in October to give the Amherst campus $1 million to facilitate the transformation of the existing Honors Program into the Commonwealth College.

The funds will also be used to form honors programs at the other campuses within the UMass system, and to create interdisciplinary honors distance–learning classes to be taken by students throughout the system.

Honors Program Director Linda Nolan said the funds will be used to increase opportunities for students at the Amherst campus in several areas, including research and foreign study opportunities and post–graduate opportunity counseling.

In addition, the funds will be used to renovate a computer lab on the sixth floor of Goodell, and to remodel the entrance to Goodell. Students will see some of these changes as early as January 1998, Nolan said.

The post–graduate opportunities office, which Nolan hopes to have in operation for spring 1998, will consist of one full–time staff member and three faculty advisers who will advise students on grants and funding available to them for graduate studies.

The office will be located in Goodell, and will be open to all UMass students, not just honors program members.

"The office will service all students on campus who are interested in graduate schools," Nolan said. "There are so many grants out there that students don't apply for because they don't know they exist. The post–graduate office will advertise fellowships and funding opportunities, and match the students up with mentors in their fields."

In addition to advising students on graduate school applications and funding, the office will direct and coordinate community service learning classes for honors students and supervise the allocation of funds for undergraduate students conducting research projects.

As part of the $1 million allocation, the Board of Higher Education earmarked $50,000 to be distributed to UMass Amherst undergraduates who conduct research or public service projects next semester and present their results at a system–wide conference in May.

Nolan said that the post–graduate opportunities office will grant students, both honors and non–honors, those funds through a competitive project review process.

"There is $50,000 available to help students with their projects," Nolan said. "They are competitive awards open to any student in good standing on the Amherst campus."

In addition, funding will be used for financial aid for honors students to study abroad, particularly for programs in England, Australia and Costa Rica during winter and summer breaks, and to bring international scholars to campus as visiting faculty.

The existing honors computer lab on the ground level floor of Goodell will be moved to the sixth floor in the spring semester, and the six–year–old equipment will be replaced with new computers.

Renovations on the entrance of Goodell will begin in January. The art department and the department of landscape architecture have been asked to make designs for the transformation of the existing space into a gallery which will depict undergraduate and graduate education.

Under the direction of Norman Aitken, deputy provost, five to 10 new interdisciplinary honors classes addressing major issues in the world will be developed by UMass Amherst faculty in the next year.

Two system–wide conferences will also be held this academic year to discuss system–wide honors standards and

SGA votes in support of Caucus

By Victoria Groves
Collegian Staff

A controversial motion divided the second meeting of the Student Government Association (SGA) undergraduate student senate at the University of Massachusetts.

A motion written by Senator Carlos Alvarez (Central Residential Area) called for the disintegration of all appointed senate seats, including ALANA (Asian, Latino, African American, Native American) Caucus and Area Government appointees and failed by a close vote on the senate floor.

Student Trustee Brian Tirrell urged the senate to stay calm when debating the motion because of the issues involved.

"This is my fourth year here and every year the issue about the Caucus has been a conflictual one. Just keep your heads cool and try not to tear down people because it's just destructive... We're all here for student," Tirrell said.

Alvarez's motion contested the current appointment system of SGA senatorial seats. The ALANA Caucus is able to appoint 13 percent of the senate body and area government representatives are also appointed to senate seats.

According to Alvarez, having appointed seats in the Senate is both illegal and also undermines democracy. He cited a ruling by the federal court of North Carolina which supposedly states it is illegal to set quo-

Kristallnacht to be remembered

By Bryan Schwartzman
Collegian Staff

On the 59th aniversary of Kristallnacht, a busload of UMass students will be traveling to Washington D.C. to experience the United States Holocaust Memorial Musem.

The trip is being organized by the Hillel House Holocaust Commemoration Commitee and is co–sponsored by the Office of Jewish Affairs.

"It's important for Jewish students to have this opportunity in a group that can provide [support and discussion] for the painful experience," said Larry Goldbaum, Director of the Office of Jewish Affairs.

"It's also important for non–Jews to have the opportunity to learn about the history and gain a greater understanding of the experience with Jews," Goldbaum said.

Hillel House Program Director David Arfa said participants on the trip will also get an introduction and a conclusion to the exibits by museum directors, something which has to be booked months in advance.

"It's a good experience for peers who are all on the same level and can relate to each other," said Michael Richman, a junior anthropology major.

Richman is not on the Commemoration Commitee but has helped them with preparations for the trip.

Kristallnacht, or "Night of Broken Glass," occured in 1938 in Germany when there was a nationwide purging and destruction of Jewish storefronts, businesses and synagogues.

"Yes, the date was planned purposefully," Arfa said. "It's a meaningful date [for] learning about events of the Holocaust and exploring their meaning."

Sophomore pre–communications major Jaclyn Sobel attented the trip last year and said it's a great deal for the price.

The trip costs $35 for students with a Hillel activity card and $40 dollars for students without. The cost includes Hotel and transportation, but does not include food.

The bus will leave Hillel at 9 a.m. on Nov. 9 and return at 11:30 p.m. the next night. Tickets are available at Tix Unlimited.

Workers' exhibition unites a community

LAUREN KOSKY / COLLEGIAN

Al Howcroft of Belchertown views his co–workers' artwork at "We are more than you see, Part II" an exhibition of UMass union workers, in the Student Union.

By Victoria Groves
Collegian Staff

As janitors, secretaries, dining common workers, tradespeople and parking officers, and also as artists, members of on–campus unions displayed their work to a packed gallery at the opening of "We Are More Than You See, II: An Exhibit of Worker Art," in the Student Union yesterday.

Office manager of AFSCME (American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees) Local 1776 and coordinator of the Labor/Management Workplace Education Program Joe Connelly co–facilitated the art show.

"This is the second time we've had the show. The first time was in 1994 when AFSCME did it alone. Now we are running it with USA (United Staff Association)," Connelly said.

This is the only official art exhibit of front–line worker art on campus.

"For people who are showing [their art], it's a great event for them. For the campus it's a reminder that the community also includes front–line workers who are sometimes invisible," Connelly said.

Sally Davis works for Housing Services in Southwest/North and had photography as well as oil paintings on display. She was inspired by the first showing of worker art.

"This was my first [artistic] endeavor in 30 years. I saw some of the work... and thought I really wanted to be a part of it," Davis said.

The art show was in part designed to show another side of front–line workers who may only be seen in passing by students and faculty otherwise.

"I think it really humanizes people... some people only see one aspect of us. You see me painting a wall and that's all you ever see. I think a show like this helps us to become part of the community," Davis said.

A maintenance worker in Bartlett Hall, Tony Deni displayed seven of his oil and acrylic paintings for viewing. Having painted since high school, Deni wants to inspire others into pursuing an interest in art.

"[The art show] gives me the opportunity to show off my work in a gallery setting... it's also an interchange of ideas and thoughts and if it gives even one student an inclination to be drawn to art, I would feel that would be a benefit," Deni said.

"For me, it's an extension of my own personal expression... it's an opportunity to present a visual image of something I'm feeling at the time," Deni said.

Lillian Coleman, a physical plant janitor, student, and AFSCME member, has been creating handmade greeting cards since 1996 and had several of them on display yesterday.

"It was a revelation from God, because it was something that I never would have done otherwise. I find it very rewarding," Coleman said.

USA President Rosemary Riley and Deputy Chancellor Marcellette Williams addressed the crowd of approximately 100 and thanked all of the participants and visitors.

Tornado blows new evidence into Whitewater

By Pete Yost
Associated Press

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. — In a bizarre Whitewater discovery, a repair shop owner opened the trunk of a tornado-damaged car and found a cashier's check for more than $20,000 payable to Bill Clinton from his former partner's savings and loan, grand jury witnesses say.

The discovery this spring of the 1982 check and thousands of other documents missing for a decade has opened a new line of inquiry by prosecutors into whether Clinton testified accurately about his relationship with James and Susan McDougal and their failed Arkansas S&L, the witnesses said.

The president swore under oath last year that he "never borrowed any money" from the McDougals' failing Madison Guaranty S&L.

Witnesses say markings on the cashier's check, which bears no Clinton endorsement, suggest that the source of the funds was McDougal's S&L, and that the proceeds may have been deposited in one of two Arkansas banks where the Clintons did business.

The president's private lawyer scoffed at the discovery yesterday. "Documents found in the trunk of an old and long-abandoned used car may have the authenticity and credibility of a newly discovered and freshly written Elvis autobiography," attorney David Kendall said.

Declaring that prosecutors are conducting "an interminable, leak-ridden inquisition," Kendall suggested the check may have been used for a 1982 repayment of a loan taken out by James McDougal at another of his banks for the Whitewater land development. "Neither the president nor Mrs. Clinton had signed for this loan," he said.

Kendall's statement, however, offered no explanation why a check for such a loan would have been made out to Clinton.

The check was projected onto a screen recently inside the courtroom where witnesses have been brought to testify in secret before the grand jury gathering evidence in the Whitewater investigation.

Independent counsel Kenneth Starr obtained a six-month extension for that grand jury last week. Deborah Gershman, a spokeswoman for his office, declined to comment yesterday.

The documents were found by a car repair shop operator in the trunk of a 1979 or 1980 Mercury Marquis — its paint peeled and windows blown out — that was damaged when tornadoes swept across Arkansas last March, according to the garage operator and the car's owner. The papers had been given a decade ago to a Madison S&L employee to be delivered to a warehouse for storage. That employee, Henry Floyd, acknowledged in an interview with The Associated Press he was supposed to deliver the documents in 1988 but went first to have his car repaired. The documents never got delivered because Floyd didn't retrieve the auto following a payment dispute.

"I kind of lost interest in the car and never picked it up," Floyd explained. "I just forgot the Madison documents were in the trunk."

Floyd said the car, which had 55,000 miles on it, had been bought for him by James McDougal's mother and "I used to drive her around in it on weekends. I just didn't think about the Madison documents."

The car, documents inside, sat unnoticed in a storage yard until the tornado.

"There was so much in the trunk that the back was weighted down," said the garage owner, who would speak only on condition of anonymity.

"There were cashier's checks just lying there. I come to one that has Bill Clinton's name on it; I saw McDougal's name, Jim Guy Tucker's name and I thought this might be something they (prosecutors) are looking for," the owner added.

Tucker, who succeeded Clinton as Arkansas governor, resigned last year after being convicted of fraud and conspiracy in the Whitewater case.

The garage operator said he talked to one of his relatives, who contacted the FBI.

The check and other documents found in the car trunk have emerged as a new area of inquiry, say three people familiar with Starr's investigation. None is in the prosecutor's office. At the time the check was written, Clinton was seeking a second term as governor after having been defeated in a 1980 bid for re-election.

"I believe we should all be democratic...ALANA should have the right to compete for senate seats. If Nazis represented 5 percent of the student body, could they say that they want 5 percent of senate seats?" Alvarez said.

"We are completely destroying the system of government we have chosen."

Sen. Malwin Davila, as a representative of the ALANA Caucus, also addressed the Senate floor in debate.

"In theory, [Alvarez's] argument seems strong but we're talking as if equal opportunity exists on this campus. We are representing a substantial part of this school," Davila said.

Davila also spoke in defense of the area government appointments.

"Without them, the composition of the senate would not be equal. They serve as a link and are probably the most connected [to students]," Davila said.

Sen. Paul Ferro (Commuter Area) spoke in favor of the motion claiming that SGA has democratic elections, but not a democratic senate.

"People ran, spent their own money, campaigned... that's democracy, that's accountability. Who are people appointed accountable to?" asked Ferro.

According to Ferro, three out of the last five student trustees were ALANA students, as were four out of the last five SGA presidents.

"I know ALANA is organized enough... organize, run candidates. Don't just appoint people," Ferro said.

All undergraduate students are eligible to fill ALANA Caucus seats.

"The ALANA Caucus does hold elections with nominees... ALANA does not discriminate and white students can be elected as ALANA senators," said Diana Estrada (ALANA Caucus).

This motion would have been a by-law change and therefore required a two thirds vote to pass through the senate. Essentially, the senate was voting to put an Action Referendum question on the ballot for the entire undergraduate community to vote on. However, the two thirds vote needed was not reached.

flexible criteria for admission to Commonwealth College.

Commonwealth College students, like current honors students, will take six honors classes, both as general education requirements in their first two years and within their major in their final two years.

The Commonwealth College will admit its first class in the fall of 1999. All current honors students will be grandfathered into the College, Nolan said, and any student who maintains a 3.2 G.P.A. will be invited into the College.

The Honors Program and the Development Office are working to secure additional private funding, from both foundations and alumni, for the Commonwealth College and for the construction of a new building in the future.

"Penn State was awarded $30 million from one alumnus for an honors college," Nolan said. "We are working in that direction.

"I would like to thank the workers that have had the courage to share with the University community their personal creativity," Riley said.

"On every wall and every corner... there is the artistic work of workers at this University. This is extraordinary," Williams said.

It takes a nation...

Luke Meredith

John Kennedy once said, "Ask not what your country can do for you, but what you can do for your country."

You know, he was right. And damn it, I need to be more active. The way I see it, I could use my space to politically activate my generation, but I haven't.

My conscience is killing me. While I write stories about the '80s, yummy mommies and Time-Out, my people are left uninformed.

There are big time problems out there, problems we must identify and solve. It's up to us to change the world. Let's make Generation X a generation of activists.

Hey, don't worry. I'm not mad at you. (Am I ever?) But we all need to start somewhere.

And I know how you like lists.

The five things wrong with America, circa 1997

Cardigan sweaters... They always make me think of Mr. Rogers. Well, that and puppets. (Long story.)

Don't let the crappy train set fool you. Rogers had a nationally syndicated TV show. He had merchandising. He had bucks. I know he could have made a few trips to the mall for a wardrobe supplement.

Two words, Mr. R. Diversify, electrify.

Very bad for America. I mean, kids could grow up thinking cardigans are cool.

Is there a God?

Country Music... I think it must have been somewhere around a really bad country music bar that the term "honky" came into usage.

Hell could very well be sitting in a really hot room listening to TNN with Randy Travis, forced to debate the merits of the white cowboy hat versus the black cowboy hat.

There would be no remote in hell. And we'd all have to wear cardigan sweaters. With puppets.

Not good for the nation.

Over-35 Men's Basketball Leagues...

P.J. once won the YMCA championship in this. But I still hold no love for this scary entity. I mean, a little "after work" pick-up game at Cedardale I can deal with. But the fact that old white guys dress up in such fashion faux-pas as Puma high-tops, New Balance tee-shirts and goggles to play a sport in which the main activities seem to be whining, bad layups and tearing cartilage is not a good thing. Let's just say Rogaine doesn't mix with the faint smell of jock itch. (Sorry for the mental picture.)

Well, at the very least, don't keep score. Please.

It's not me asking. It's your country.

"Live with Regis and Kathie Lee"...

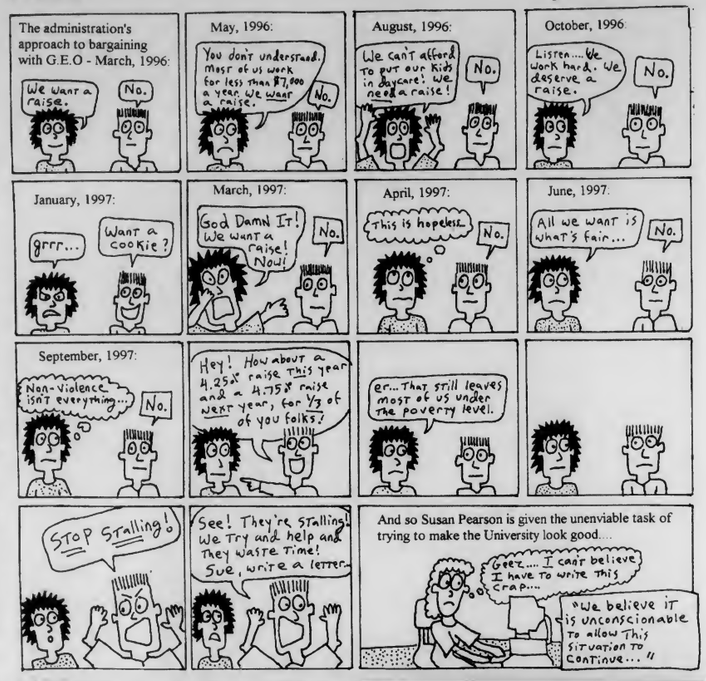
You know how old people say, "That [thing, or what not] is everything that is wrong with America"? Well, that thing, (or what not) is Kathie Lee Gifford.

And Regis? He's the kind of guy who attends luncheons complaining about his golf game: the fact that his Cadillac just keeps making that "chh-chhh-clunk" noise on the way to the country club (but hey, don't we all make a "chh-chhh- clunk noise every once in awhile?) and tells stories about how he and the Flaherty brothers used to play tackle football in the middle of the street in Brooklyn in 1948, when the Dodgers were still in town.

Oh, Regis. You've set America back 60 years. But then, even JFK didn't deal with this one.

Karaoke...

On the first night of my college career, the good people at UMass-Lowell ended orientation with a little karaoke. Some girl gets up there and starts belting out "Wanted Dead or Alive." Now you know how I feel about Bon Jovi. To see the words of one of the most poignant lyricists of our generation ("Living on a Prayer" still speaks about more than Tommy and Gina. It speaks about us.) butchered to death by some random chick upset me enough to want to do something about it.



But I didn't. I wasted an opportunity to make a difference.

JFK wouldn't have been happy. His generation was a generation of activists. They didn't do anything wrong.

Major Insurance Savings

Sport utility vehicles have been taking their lumps in the press due to mounting evidence of their tendencies to roll over taking turns and kill all the occupants. This has led extremists to demand that insurance companies charge higher rates to owners of the larger vehicles to cover the greater damage they cause. But a major firm, State Farm Insurance, has stepped forward to challenge this conventional wisdom. Dale Nelson, a State Farm actuary, says the company's own research shows sports utility vehicles do not have higher bodily injury and property damage liability costs. In fact, reports Mr. Nelson, "Sport utility vehicles may actually save insurers money in a few accidents, by killing people who might otherwise have survived with serious injuries. Severe injuries tend to produce larger settlements than deaths." Rumor has it that Jeep Cherokee will receive State Farm's Public Service Award for reducing costly insurance claims. (New York Times, 10/17)

Avid Magazine Readers

Literary interest has been flowering among the executives of our nation's major chain stores. Big discount centers like Winn-Dixie and Wal-Mart are now demanding advance copies of magazines carried by their stores. Not only do they get the pleasure of reading articles first, they can also protect their customers from unwanted material. For example, the Winn-Dixie chain banned the March issue of Cosmopolitan for a headline about "His and Her Orgasms." Winn-Dixie regularly bans not only questionable photos, but also articles on topics like abortion, homosexuality and religion. Says spokesman G.E. Clerc, Jr., "We would prefer that their publications didn't offend anyone." And at Wal-Mart, manager Teresa Stanton reports, "every other week I pull something off the shelf that I don't think is of Wal-Mart quality." Fortunately, publishers are becoming attuned to difficult concepts like "Wal-Mart quality." The Wall Street Journal reports "Publishers are increasingly anticipating retail chains concerns." So we needn't lose sleep worrying about censorship, right? (Wall Street Journal 10/22)

Advertisers Face a Challenge

A shocking research finding was presented at the 88th convention of the Association of National Advertisers devoted to "Branding the Future." Scott Bedberry, a marketing VP with Starbuck's, told the assembled ad executives that today, "Consumers don't truly believe there's a huge difference between products (!)" How to respond to such traitorous notions? Make significant changes in products? No. The key, says Mr. Bedberry, is to "establish emotional ties" between brands and consumers. Fortunately, this is a mounting trend. Carl Pascarella, CEO of VISA USA, proclaimed the good news that "name-brand products have recaptured the hearts and minds of consumers." Now that we are all breathing a sigh of relief, there is this advice from American Express' John Haynes on how to solidify the all-important brand-customer bond. Using a new definition of the word "dialogue" better fit for the mass media, Haynes tells advertisers to "create and sustain a dialogue with your customer." (New York Times, 10/20)

A Rise in Nudity

The city council in Laramie, Wyo. is considering a new ordinance that would expand the definition of the "nudity" to be banned in public places. The first addition will be applauded by all right thinking persons who have ever had to view the posterior of a certain type of beer-bellied construction worker. This part of the ordinance prohibits showing the cleft of the buttocks. But the next section of the original law is a truly important advance that covers a part of male bodies that may be clothed yet exposed. The ordinance defined nudity to include "male genitals in a discernibly turgid state." The law did not spell out the duties of police officers, but we're sure Laramie's finest would have been vigilant in seeking out "discernible turgid" genitals on males. But alas, that reasonable addition was dropped, probably due to politics. (ACLU Press Release, 10/22)

The Collegian Editorial page needs new writers. We want you to write humor, politics, satire, lifestyle, or any of a thousand other styles — let us be as broad as the student body is.

We especially encourage material that relates to current issues at UMass.

Anyone who is interested should submit material by e-mail (letters@oitvms.oit.umass.edu), fax (545-1592), or by dropping it off at the Collegian offices for Dan Bodah.

Editorials should be 500-700 words long and should include a phone number so we can call you back.

Letters to the Editor

GEO notes inaccuracies

To the Editor:

We are pleased that the Collegian has taken the time to contact the Graduate Employee Organization regarding the current contract negotiations. The article (Nov. 4) was important in educating the greater University community of an issue affecting some 2600 graduate employees on this campus. We will continue to negotiate in good faith with the administration, and we are confident that if good faith is reciprocated, agreement can be reached.

A few minor inaccuracies in the article do deserve brief attention. First, you report that the letter-writing campaign has been completed. This could not be farther from the truth. It is indeed the case that over 25 departments have already written letters, but more departments continue to do so every day. Graduate employees plan to continue delivering letters to the Chancellor until a contract is settled.

Second, you report that the poverty level for a single person in Massachusetts is below most graduate student salaries. It is fact the other way around. While the poverty level is $7740 for one person, the average salary for GEO employees is $6991. Incidentally, this same salary would put a family of four at less than one-half of the poverty level.

We encourage all interested parties to refer to GEO's memo to members of all campus unions, dated Nov. 3, to get more detailed information on negotiations.

ALANA Caucus serves real needs

To the Editor:

This is in response to Senator Alvarez from the Central residential area. Being a member of the ALANA community here at UMass I agree 100% when Mr. Alvarez says that "a diverse environment is the best educational tool at the University." But how diverse is this environment? Hasn't he looked around lately?

I disagree with Mr. Alvarez when he says we are undermining our democratic system. He might not be aware of past problems here at UMass affecting the ALANA community and everyone else. He has probably heard of the Whitmore takeover, the admissions building takeover and, most recently, the Goodell takeover. But does he really understand the issues raised by these student protests?

I have no doubt that his is an informed opinion, but just in case you may have overlooked the figures, there is a very low percentage of ALANA students here, not even meeting the University policy. Therefore if we hold elections "openly" and don't automatically assign 13% of the senate to be ALANA, the ALANA community will not be represented at all. Whether or not he agrees, this includes Mr. Alvarez. Such groups as the ALANA Caucus exist because there is a lack of representation of people of color. What Mr. Alvarez fails to realize is that the socioeconomic implications attached to being an ALANA student, as well as the discrimination that comes with it, add to that lack of representation.

What hurts me and other members of the ALANA community is that Mr. Alvarez is supposed to be one of us, and what hurts me personally is that he is Dominican like me and should know the struggle that our people go through. When deciding to present a motion such as this he should take into consideration that he is going to hurt all students of color. The ALANA Caucus is something that was created out of a need. A need for representation, a need for fair and equal treatment; and until that need is met the ALANA Caucus must exist to balance the uneven and unjust scale at UMass.

The Invasion continues!

From The Beatles to Blur: Four decades of pop mastery

Adam Levine

I will always remember my mother telling me about the time she saw the Beatles in 1964. She explained to me that she couldn't even hear a sound made by the Fab Four because their voices were overcome by thousands of constant screams. Yet, this never fazed her one bit: she was there in Shea Stadium seeing with her own eyes the band that helped shape her early teenage years. My mother lived through the first wave of the British invasion, one of the most triumphant periods in contemporary music history.

The styles and trends of music will forever follow a certain pattern of evolution. As a particular musical genre erupts, it then creates a new subculture of society, but nothing can remain at the top forever. Luckily our fascinations with nostalgia can keep particular music trends alive and can often inspire whole new dimensions of that musical category. There is no better example of this phenomenon, with perhaps the exception of disco's metamorphosis into techno, than British pop.

The Beatles combined with the ranks of other exquisite supergroups including The Rolling Stones, The Who and please don't forget The Kinks, who all served as the foundation of the original British invasion. Inspired

A brief history of time: British electronic music

Marty Keane

With the term "electronica" being thrown around these days like a Frisbee, an overview explanation of its roots is sorely past due.

In America, it is merely an industry buzzword for machine-generated music that many feel is the next money- maker now that alt-rock is quickly getting played out. But overseas, it is much more than just a way to make money. In short, it is a very real part — first artistically and now commercially — of the British musical landscape.

Much the same as their counterparts in the Britpop realm, the electronic artists from across the pond have essentially embraced what were originally American ideals and concepts and simply expounded upon them, and ultimately put them on the map. Such is the case with the unequivocally brilliant Brian Eno, who got much of his musical inspiration from listening to doo wop and early rock 'n roll played on U.S. Armed Forces radio from a base located near his home in Suffolk.

An Anglophile r[illegible]ade of decadence

Adam Dlugacz

It was the '80s. I could see right through the makeup and hairspray of mainstream music and I hadn't begun to experience hip hop or punk, nor was I impressed with the '70s and their leftovers. I was without a music scene to call my own. Then I experienced the ecstatic bliss of the Smiths.

The first British pop album I heard was Meat[illegible] and, although[illegible] as their worst[illegible] In all of five seconds, the Smiths spoke to me in a way that no other band, or person for that matter, ever had. The Smiths were honest, they were depressed, they offered no illusions of life, they made you feel like it was okay to be a shy, lonely misfit and that you weren't the only one who felt that way. Queen Is Dead, Louder Than Bombs and Strangeways Here We Come, I was slightly fanatical. Of course the greatest two lines ever uttered by [illegible] were "Hand in glove the way you [illegible] Shake me if you've heard This One Before," and "I think about life and I think about death and neither one particularly appeals to me." The Smiths were truly the voice of a disillusioned generation.

I could not stop at the Smiths. I was overcome with the need to hear more of these great musicians from England. The next band I discovered was The Stone Roses. The Stone Roses are perhaps the most tragic of all the British acts as they released one of the most brilliantly constructed albums Stone Roses, and then fell off the Elton John mesmerized the audience at the Mullins Center last night, showing off his vocal and musical talents as well as securing his title of a modern Liberace.

Elton John: still England's rose

Pop's consummate showman demonstrates why he's the best

ELTON JOHN
William D. Mullins Center
Nov. 5

One only needed to gaze out upon the legions of fans inside a packed–and–then–some Mullins Center last night — varying in age from the very young to the very old — to fully appreciate Elton John's enduring popularity.

John gave a career–spanning performance over a generous 26–song set to a record–setting crowd, and more importantly, he did it with a surprisingly youthful gusto.

Beyond being a nearly virtuostic pianist and a talented songwriter and singer, John gloriously proved why he is the still the preeminent showman, not only in the music industry, but in the entire entertainment business.

Accompanied by a crack and enthusiastic backing band of seven musicians, and welcomed by warm crowd applause and cheering, John took the stage to "The Simple Life," which was deftly augmented by synth–generated bluesy harmonica chords. He followed it up with "The One," the title track from his overlooked 1992 album.

Next, John took a conspicuous Diet Coke break, perhaps in deference to his recent commercial endorsement of the red–striped cola. During this time, John paused to shake hands with members of the audience, some of whom passed flowers up to him. He also signed autographs for fans, who handed him their overpriced "The Big Picture Tour" programs.

John's program spanned the classics to his latest and he started off with a couple tracks off of one of his more popular albums, 1973's Goodbye Yellow Brick Road. He had the crowd on their feet for the up–beat "Gray Seal" and the pleaser, "Yellow Brick Road."

John showed off his formidable piano skills on the jazzy "Honky Cat," which featured a solo by David Johnstone on banjo and Bob Birch's throbbing low–end bass line. At one point, the piano and banjo competed with each other for attention — demonstrating the talent of both musicians.

With "Can You Feel The Love Tonight," a song off the Lion King soundtrack and with lyrics by Tim Rice, John smoothly showed why it won a Grammy for Best Male Pop Vocal and The Academy Award for Best Original Song.

"Tiny Dancer" and "I Guess That's Why They Call It the Blues" demonstrated that even with a cold, John has the innate ability to magically summon his voice as if through some otherworldly talent.

John played a few songs off The Big Picture, including the current single, "Something About the Way You Look Tonight." He also added the gospel "If the River Can Bend" and the dry "Love Has A Lot To Answer For," each of which had distinct elements of John Tesh–ian New Age kitsch. Unfortunately, the latter two fell flat and sounded stale.

But on his older material, John was able to rouse the crowd at will, especially with the utterly infectious "I Don't Want To Go On With You Like That," which had a charmingly real sense of personality rather than the canned keyboard of the studio version. Carried by John's piano, he fiestily shouted the pouty refrain of "I don't wanna" and ended with a flourish with another forceful piano solo.

John dedicated "The Last Song" to Jason Needham and all HIV/AIDS sufferers. Playing without his band, he displayed more emotion than at any other time in the show, and even dampened his eyes. His voice resonated through the Mullins Center deeply, putting even more heart into already poignant and touching lyrics. The audience responded to the sheer emotion of the moment, lighting up their cigarette lighters in a surreal "Bon Jovi" gesture.

"Made in England" appropriately had several fans waving a Union Jack. An uplifting but simple autobiographical number, it was one of the show's surprising high points. Also off of 1994's Made in England, the plaintively elegant ballad "Believe" juxtaposed ominous guitar chords and keyboard strains with John's soaring vocals in a moment of sheer transcendence.

A swinging, note–perfect rendition of "Bennie and the Jets" suggested that Elton John just may be our generation's Liberace. It ended in a foot–stomping romp built around a nifty piano ditty that bridged both chorus and verse.

John closed the main set with the ever–popular and stirring "Saturday Night's Alright For Fighting" — chock–full of his typical playfulness and flamboyance.

Contrary to expectations, John wisely chose not to include "Candle in the Wind" in the set. Rather, John addressed the crowd, saying he chose not to sing the memorial song for obvious reasons and chose Beth Nielson–Chapman's achingly beautiful "Sand and the Water" instead.

Ending the evening, John dedicated the simple, yet elegant, "Your Song" to the audience, thanking the crowd for their support over "these tough past few months."

On a chilly fall night in Amherst, John made believers out of all.

Women's Issues

Thursday, November 6, 1997

How safe are women on campus?

How safe are women on the UMass campus? According to statistics compiled by the Everywoman's Center Counselor/Advocate Program, not very.

During the fiscal year 1996–1997 (including summers) there were 241 reports of sexual assault made to the service providers at UMass. Of these, 197 were first time reports, which means 32 of the assaults had been previously reported.

The month of November 1996 had the most total reports of assault with 45. The months with the lowest number of reports are July 1996 and June 1997 (with one and two reports, respectively).

The three most frequently reported types of assault during 1996–1997 were obscene phone calls, rape or attempted rape and voyeurism. Obscene phone calls made up about 28 percent of the reports; rape/attempted rape made up 22 percent of the reports; and voyeurism was 15 percent of the reports.

Other types of assault reported included verbal and physical sexual assault, harassment and graffiti.

Of the current first–time assaults reported, 73 percent occurred on campus, and more than half (57 percent) occurred in residence halls. Alarmingly, 36 percent of reported assaults occurred in the Southwest residence area alone.

In 24 percent of the reports, victims stated that there was physical force used. A small but significant two percent of the victims reported that they had been threatened with death.

Not surprisingly, most of the victims of sexual assault at UMass were female. Of the victims who reported assaults, 91 percent were female, and 8 percent were male. One percent did not supply this information.

As for the ethnicities of the assault victims, about 78 percent of the victims reported their race/ethnicity as white. About 8 percent reported their race/ethnicity as black, 3 percent reported it to be Asian, and 2 percent reported it to be Hispanic. In about 10 percent of the reports, victims did not supply this information.

The age range of the victims was from 15 to 48. Of the victims, 25 percent were 20 years old at the time of assault. Most of the assaults reported (76 percent) occurred to victims within the age range of 18 to 21.

Undergraduates made up about 80 percent of the victims of sexual assault. Staff members made up six percent of the victims of sexual assault and graduate students were about 3 percent of the victims.

As for the offenders in these assaults, it is not surprising that most of the total offenders were male (76 percent). Only 1 percent of offenders were female.

Forty–eight percent of the victims reported the offender's race/ethnicity as unknown. About 32 percent of the offenders were reported as white, six percent as black, one percent as mixed, and in 13.5 percent of the reports this information was not supplied.

What do these statistics mean for women, both students and faculty, on the UMass campus? What must be done to help prevent such assaults from occurring? What is UMass doing — or not doing — to help stop assault on campus? What can women do to help protect themselves from attacks on campus?

These are the questions we must ask and seek to answer as women on campus.

Author Jamaica Kincaid to read from new memoir

On Friday, Nov. 14, Jamaica Kincaid, the critically acclaimed novelist and writer of the new memoir My Brother (Farrar Straus Giroux), will be reading and signing copies of her new book at Gamble Auditorium at Mt. Holyoke College. The event is sponsored by the Odyssey Bookshop and the Inclusiveness Program at Mt. Holyoke College.

Kincaid's memoir has just been nominated for the 1997 National Book Award in the non–fiction category. National Book Award prize winners will be announced on Nov. 18 in New York, four days after Kincaid's appearance at Mt. Holyoke.

A memoir like no other, My Brother tells the true story of Kincaid's family on the island of Antigua— a constellation centered around the powerful figure of her mother. At the heart of Kincaid's story is her shockingly frank depiction of the life of her younger brother, who died of AIDS last year at the age of 33.

In addition to My Brother, Jamaica Kincaid is the author of At the Bottom of the River, a collection of stories; Annie John, A Small Place, Lucy and The Autobiography of my Mother. Her stories have also appeared in The New Yorker, Rolling Stone and The Paris Review.

The reading will take place on Nov. 14, at 7:30 p.m. in Gamble Auditorium at Mt. Holyoke College. The reading will be free and open to all. For more information, contact the Odyssey Bookshop at (413) 534–7307 or 1–800–540– 7307.

Professors to hold discussion on Princess Diana

On Thursday, November 13 at 7:30 p.m., a special event entitled Reading Diana will be held at Gamble Auditorium at Mt. Holyoke College.

An interdisciplinary panel will discuss the cultural meanings of the life and death of Diana, Princess of Wales and the myriad reactions to her funeral.

The members of the panel and their discussion topics will include Alexandrina Deschamps, UMass (Women's Studies): "Princess Di and the Cult of True Womanhood: Postscripts from a Rebellious Royal"; Liza Maurizio, UMass (Classics): "A Voice of her Own? The Autobiography of Princess Diana"; Elisabeth Subrin, Amherst and Mt. Holyoke Colleges (Film/Video): "Diana's Representation in the Press in Relation to Anorexia as a Language Disorder and Deviant Communication Strategy"; Philip Green, Smith College (Government): "Diana as a Political Icon: Royalty, Democracy, and Femininity"; Ambreen Hai, Smith College (English):"Remembering Empire, Dis–Membering Diana: a Post–Colonial Reading of Diana as Inter–National Body". Gail Hornstein, Mt. Holyoke College (Psychology), will serve as moderator.

For more information, contact Claire Chang at (413) 538– 2022.

Everywoman's Center has provided 25 years of service

Most UMass students know that the Everywoman's Center exists as a resource for women on campus and in the Five College area. Although many may believe the Center is only a place to go when a woman has a problem, this is not the case. It is our responsibility as women to take care of one another, and the Everywoman's Center is a convenient, accessible place to go for support, counseling and general information.

Kelly Parent

The Center, a multicultural women's center established in 1972, celebrated its 25th anniversary this year. The Center, located in Wilder Hall, continues to prove it is willing to go the distance for women, withstanding budget cuts over the years. It relies heavily on volunteers, interns and other dedicated individuals to keep it going.

The Everywoman's Center offers a variety of free services to community women. It has a complete, diverse library pertaining to women–related issues and experiences. It leads weekly discussion and support groups, such as the recently– formed Post–Abortion Support Group.

This semester, the Center offers workshops dealing with self–esteem, lesbian relationships and women's personal empowerment, to name a few. It also maintains comprehensive programs such as the Women of Color Program.

The Center has recently launched a new project called MARS (Mentors/Advocates for Respect and Safety), which is a collaborative effort between the Everywoman's Center and the Men's Resource Center. The program is devoted to the education of junior high school boys by trained male high school and college students on the subject of violence and sexual assault against women. The Center recognizes that it is important for men to take responsibility for an issue which does not just concern women.

The Center has a staff of counselors who will assist women in resources and referrals on most matters, including where to go for welfare support and daycare.

The Center offers a 24–hour hotline for victims of violence (413–545–0800), as well as an information line (413–545–0883). Another hotline for area women is the Massachusetts Toll–Free hotline (888–337–0800).

Kelly Parent is a UMass student.

Post–Abortion Support Group

Everywoman's Center and the Abortion Rights Fund of Western Massachusetts are co–sponsoring a Post–Abortion Support Group. The group will meet for four sessions, and will provide a safe, pro–choice environment to discuss and share any feelings and thoughts related to the abortion experience. The group will begin in mid–November and will be held on Wednesdays from 5:30 to 7 p.m. This group is free and open to all campus and community women. For more information and pre–registration please call Everywoman's Center at (413) 545–0883.

COME ON DOWN TO THE COLLEGIAN TALK TO LAURA AND GET A JOB WRITING FOR WOMEN'S ISSUES..... IT'S JUST THAT SIMPLE.

Um, hi.

It would be really cool if you females out there would come by and tell me you want to write for the Women's Issues page. See, I need writers, and I want all kinds of girls to feel welcome to speak up on most anything that concerns them/us. OK? So come down to the Collegian office in the Campus Center basement, or drop me a note. Thanks. You'll be happy you did. Love,

Examining relationship violence

Even though her eyes were swollen shut, Jahayra found her mark. She landed a right hook right under his eye. He slapped her. The force sent her reeling back towards the car door, which he conveniently opened. She fell onto the pavement in the middle of an intersection. Luckily, the car coming toward her stopped to help. So did a number of others. Bloodied and confused, Jahayra got up and left. As they watched her leave, nobody could understand how she was able to move. The car she was dumped out of was going at least 40 miles per hour.

Susan Nickerson

I think he's hitting me again. I don't know because I have accomplished the task of making myself numb. I am in my happy shell, feeling no pain. Even after he stops and begs my forgiveness, I still sit there. I am hugging my knees, rocking back and forth. His mother comes in and sees my tears. She ignores them, hoping it will go away. She is so good at it by now.

I tried talking to my mother, his mother, my friends, my guidance counselor, even the police, but they all turned a deaf ear. Things like this don't happen in a white middle– class suburb like Agawam. It only happens in inner cities, in low–income households where people don't know how to behave because they are not sufficiently educated. So there I sat, a victim of violence who did not exist because I was from a small New England town. I wasn't sure if I did exist anymore.

Jahayra met her boyfriend when she was 16. He was a family friend; their mothers were good friends before they were born. Jahayra's brother showed him pictures of her, and he began calling her. He was well–mannered, everyone thought. He opened doors for her, and bought her flowers, candy and gifts on numerous occasions; usually around the times he put her in the Intensive Care unit for days.

His jealousy did not bother Jahayra at first. She thought it was his way of showing his love for her. So when he started telling her what she should wear, who she could talk to, she paid no attention. She felt she had to do as he said because she had nowhere else to go. She got kicked out of her aunt's house and he offered her his room. That room, besides the hospital, was where she spent most of the three years they were together.

She would go to school, go home, go right to work. She had no time for friends or family, yet he would get jealous. He had her under his complete control— economically, emotionally and sexually.

Jahayra was from the low–income projects of Lawrence, Mass. Her mother was addicted to drugs and her brother was in and out of jail constantly, so Jahayra had no one to depend on, financially or otherwise, except for herself and her boyfriend. He always made sure to remind her that without him, she was alone in this world.

Bill never left bruises on my face. I never had to be admitted into the hospital, and I never bled. But if you look closely at my neck, you can see the scars from where the chicken wire cut into my flesh, and on my breasts are remembrances of teeth marks.

I left him over three years ago, but the emotional scars run so deep that I still don't sleep through the night. I was met with much speculation because I could not prove my abuse. Nobody knew about sexual, verbal, emotional, or economical abuse. Many people still don't know. Yet it is real, and if I had been aware of it, I could have escaped the physical abuse that followed.

Jahayra and I are success stories. We both attend college; she at Mount Holyoke, me at good old UMass. We hope that our stories are an eye–opener for everyone, since we are real people, not just women you read about in a pamphlet.

We want to eliminate the myth that people do not leave their abusers. Women do leave, often more than once. But for some, after they leave, the abuse gets worse. They are threatened, stalked, even killed.

Abuse is about power and control, and when you leave, the abuser has lost that control. Often when you leave, you find that there is no one left, because your abuser has isolated you from your friends and family. Even if your friends and family are still around, they cannot always protect you from the abuser.

I tried speaking to my family, my friends, the police, but no one helped me. I had to leave the state for seven months to flee from him.

Jahayra attempted suicide three times because she thought it was her only escape.

When people say to me, "Why didn't you just leave?" I laugh at them. Who would have protected me?

Jahayra and I are still stalked by our abusers. They remind us that they still know our every move. Yet we do not fear for our lives. We fear for the one thing they can take away from us which actually helped us to get away: our educations.

20 simple ways to get called a bitch

You know, it's very easy and lots of fun to get yourself called a bitch. Such a common, yet derogatory term, so clear, blunt and obvious. How many times a day do you overhear people (both girls and boys) dismissing girls' behavior by saying something like, "She's such a bitch" or "She was soooo bitchy today?" It happens all the time!

Laura Barcella

Personally, I don't mind being called a bitch unless it's by someone I really care about. The term "bitch" could mean anything, and there are so many options to the personality trait it could be describing.

That's what people forgot when they started maliciously throwing the word around — what, exactly, is wrong with a "female dog"? Are we supposed to be scared of them? Are they supposed to be ugly or stupid or vicious? I don't think so, and I refuse to generalize about all female dogs.

The term "bitch" has no real definition (thus no real significance), so it has taken on a myriad of meanings. It is here for the taking, so I believe we girls should start taking it as our own.

Come on girls, let's forget about Bitchaphobia. If someone calls you a bitch, remember it's because they are intimidated by you in some way, and that's a compliment. A bitch–caller is usually scared because you're not living up to society's prescribed "feminine" expectations and roles. You're not doing what some morons expect you to do, so you're automatically dismissed to make them feel better about their own pathetic, generic, dull existences.

The term "bitch" as it is commonly used can connote power, disregard, even a degree of superiority about the lucky subject. Usually, if one is a true bitch, she just doesn't care. She's on a level beyond others, she looks out for herself, and she does what she wants and needs to do, regardless of how others may view her actions.

Really, who wants to be sweet, warm and accommodating all the time? Who wants to ever? I say only when such niceties are deserved, and that's not often. So dig in girls, here are the guidelines for how you too can experience the joy and liberation of being called a bitch. Follow these rules and soon you too will be a rip–roarin', hell–raisin' bitch sis! (Rules are in no particular order.)

1. Be pretty—naturally or with cosmetic assistance.
2. Be not pretty—naturally or on purpose.
3. Don't respond when strange boys whistle, catcall, offer sexual favors, or "compliment" you on your body when you're walking down the street.
4. Refuse a boy when he wants to take you out.
5. Refuse a boy when he wants sex.
6. Walk around with an ounce of confidence (head held high = Bitch).
7. Debate often, and don't back down 'til you win.
8. Know things, and take opportunities to enlighten others.
9. Do not have a perpetual smile on your face.
10. Be loud and obnoxious.
11. Be reserved or introspective—e.g. don't blabber, wail, gossip, or chit–chat about stupid stuff to people you don't like in the first place.
12. Know what you want, and refuse to compromise.
13. Have ambitions, desires and goals in life and actively pursue them.
14. Don't undermine your own skills, talents and strengths.
15. Don't be fearful, weak, or passive— don't play the victim.
18. Be proud of your body.
19. Be sexy or confident in your sexuality.
20. Oh heavens, I almost forgot this one— kiss someone another girl has her eye on.

Marvel Comics debuts new X–Men writers with mixed results

Oh, how the mighty have fallen. The two core X-Men titles, Uncanny X–Men and X–Men, have both lost eight creators since 1992. Talented ones, too. People like Chris Claremont, John Romita Jr and John Byrne have all abandoned the X–Men flagships faster than audiences fleeing theaters from the latest Batman sequel, and the trend continues. Recently, the Marvel editorial staff introduced two brand new writers and artists who will have their hands full trying to retain the X–Men's massive popularity and perhaps more importantly, keep the books selling in the top five. Here's a report card of their debut issues: Uncanny X– Men #350 (Marvel $3.99) Writer: Steven Seagle Artist: Joe Madureira and Andy Smith.

Finally, after three weeks of delays, this long awaited "Trial Of Gambit" issue hit the comic shop shelves, proclaiming from its shiny foil–enhanced cover: "350th issue spectacular!" "Gambit's greatest secret revealed!" "Some secrets can never be forgiven!" However, after reading this mega–hyped issue, I think they left out one important cover blurb: "The biggest waste of four bucks since the matinee showing of Batman & Robin at the showcase cinema!" Yes folks, it's sad but true. This comic book was not worth the wait. In fact, it was one of the most disjointed, stopby, un– fulfilling comics to come out in recent memory. Basically what happens is that Gambit, the Han Solo–ish cajun X–Man, is taken to a mysterious citadel in the middle of the Antarctic by an unknown enemy to stand trial for a dark deed he performed years before he joined up with the X– Men, who are also taken to the castle to serve as Gambit's jury. (Get all that? Don't worry, neither did I.)

FOUR COLOR COMMENTARY by Jeff Carter

Okay, problem number one: Why the hell are there always secret technological castles popping up everywhere the X– Men go? The X–Men could be on a mission near your Uncle Ralph's house in Battleboro,Vt., and I guarantee you a "huge mysterious fortress" would pop up right between the garage and the maple trees. It's simply ludicrous. The debut scripting by Steven Seagle (Alpha Flight, Sandman Mystery Theater), is choppy and difficult to follow, jumping around from location to location and character to character with complete disregard for suspenseful story pacing. By the time we get to the actual trial and Gambit's big revelation, we've already suffered through 30 pages of disjointed interludes featuring other characters not directly involved in the storyline. Oh, and what of Gambit's terrible, loathsome, dark secret? It's pathetic. A letdown of immeasurable proportions. From the advance hype, Marvel made it sound as if Gambit was responsible for breaking Rob Liefeld into comics or an equally hideous deed, something the X–Men would never forgive him for. I'm not going to ruin it for you, but let me just say that Wolverine has done 10 times worse in his career, and the X–men still kiss his ass on a daily basis. The mystery villain? Again, I'm not going to reveal anything, but it's just too good to be true. I didn't buy and I don't think any intelligent X–Men fans will either. If this is the kind of effort we can expect every month from Seagle and new artist Chris Bachalo (Generation X), The X–Men's sales dominance could be in serious jeopardy. Forget Gambit, Seagle should be the one put on trial for cranking out this dud. D

X–Men #70 (Marvel, $1.99) Writer: Joe Kelly Artist: Carlos Pacheo

In the wake of events occurring in Uncanny X–Men #350 and the "Zero Tolerance" crossover. the X–Men finally re– unite at the Xavier mansion where they discover their entire headquarters has been literally stripped down to the wood by Bastion and his Zero Tolerance forces. As if that wasn't bad enough, the X–Men must also figure out a way to save the life of their team leader Cyclops, without the benefit of their advanced medical technology. I was very concerned about Joe Kelly, the young writer of Daredevil and Deadpool, coming aboard to script our beloved mutants. I felt he was an untested writer who focused too much on mindless action sequences and humor than on characterization and dramatic storytelling. But after reading this issue, Kelly proved me wrong. In fact, he made me feel like a total idiot. Kelly did a tremendous job on this comic, giving us the best characterizations of the X–Men in years. Beast was witty and wisecracking, Wolverine was stubborn and short–tempered, Cyclops was brave and stoic in the face of danger, and so on. These characters came to life and they just felt right in Kelly's hands. Kelly even made me enjoy the three new X– Men members: Maggott, Marrow and Dr. Reyes — three characters I felt were annoying and flat in prior appearances. Carlos Pacheo's pencils were stellar in this issue, and he's really coming to his own as a talented artist. Bottom line, X– Men #70 was a solid enjoyable read on every level and Kelly has this title moving the right track. B+

■ pop

by the early roots of rock, which were primarily founded here in the United States and led by the King himself (meaning Elvis of course). Britain was then able to commercialize rock and roll like no one else before. They were, in fact, an entire movement of their own.

The turbulent '60s were, in many levels, defined by this new concept of rebellious music, which these British bands served as the emphasis of their messages. British pop evolved during this period and their lyrical substance altered from girlfriends and lollipops to a darker more abstract sound.

The direction of British pop progressed immensely throughout the following three decades. In the '70s, Britain took American new wave, as well as classic British rock like the Rolling Stones and The Who, one step further — as well as faster and louder — and called it punk. The forerunners of this genre were The Sex Pistols and The Clash, and later The Jam. Punk has seen many changes throughout years, mostly when punk reemerged state–side in the '80s, yet it will always contain its angst–ridden essence introduced by its early British originators.

Throughout the '70s and '80s, the second British invasion was led by such diverse acts as David Bowie, Duran Duran and The Smiths, as well as the previously mentioned punk bands, to name just a few. Smaller bands from this period such as James, XTC, New Order and the Psychedelic Furs were eventually able to break away from their cult status and establish a greater sense of success. The best example of this is Pulp, who for years never received the attention they deserved until they released their super hit, and karaoke fave, "Common People" in 1994. But, all of these influences have combined together in countless ways to create the mold of contemporary Brit pop.

Bowie and Duran Duran are still making worthy albums, especially the latest release from Duran Duran, which is their best work since the mid–'80s. However, other notable bands like The Jesus and Mary Chain and Primal Scream have risen throughout the '80s and are still strongly a part of contemporary music today. They have constantly and successfully challenged the boundaries of rock and roll and will continue to spread their influence long after they themselves have faded away.

In the very late '80s and on into the '90s, a new slew of British pop bands formed with the hope of making their mark like their predecessors before them. They are the third part in a continuing invasion and among them, debatably, the most prominent have been The Stone Roses, Happy Mondays, Supergrass, Ned's Atomic Dustbin, Suede, Oasis, Radiohead, The Verve and my personal fave Blur. (There are others of course, but I can't have this column go on forever. If I missed your favorite band, then deal). Each of these bands have set a precedent and the latest releases from Radiohead, The Verve and Primal Scream are perhaps their best work to date. Even of these bands who have passed on, many of their members have continued to form new acts and carry on their legacies.

The heated disputes between the two invasion generals, Noel Gallagher of Oasis and Damon Albarn of Blur, only proves how seriously fans take Britpop. As they compete against each other they are also competing amongst themselves — perhaps that is why the music of these bands continues to ripen with every release. In many ways, British pop refuses to follow similar cliches and conventions as American music (with the exception of Bush, but we won't mention them). What I mean is that Britpop is not only more diverse, but more creative as well when compared to popular American grunge. We may have won the war back in the day of redcoats and muskets, but they sure kick our butts with a guitar in hand.

in this movement has been the hugely influential Mo'Wax Records whose 1994 Headz compilation collects much of the label's best talent (DJ Shadow, U.N.K.L.E., Autechre, Luke Vibert), many of whom are American acts who, up until very recently simply did not have an audience in this country. A native of Cornwall, Vibert inked a deal with Trent Reznor's influential Nothing label, home to influential U.K. acts Mcat Beat Manifesto and Pop Will Eat Itself. On the recently released Drum 'n' Bass For Papa + Plug 1.P's 1, 2, 3, Vibert has returned under the pseudonym Plug in a bold, convoluted re–invention/deconstruction of breakbeat and drum 'n bass; it's a futuristic melding of nearly every electronic sub–genre. Of course the one inherent advantage in Britain is the compact geographic size of the country. Sure, the techno and house movements were started in Detroit and Chicago respectively, but how many people know that? However, in the U.K., nearly everything is centered around London, and to a lesser degree, Manchester.

Over there, artists such as the Chemical Brothers, Prodigy, Aphex Twin, Underworld, Orb and Orbital often duke it out with their brethren in Britpop for chart supremacy. Last year, Underworld's "Born Slippy" single went into the charts at No. 2 — a feat not likely to be soon repeated here, where hip hop and Top 40 rule the singles charts.

Another key difference between our two countries is the prevalence of the rave/club scene, especially in England's major cities. The steady adaptation of this chic culture into the demands of mainstream consciousness has been a major factor in electronic music gaining such a wide audience. London's world famous club, The Ministry of Sound, even has its own label which has put out several seminal releases, including Sasha and John Digweed's fabulous new Northern Exposure, which is over two full hours of continuous club music.

Although clearly in a major period of creative innovation at present, the Brits have, beginning with Eno, over the past 20 years or so virtually singlehandedly defined the vast majority of electronic music.

After the death of Ian Curtis, the surviving members of post–punk pioneers Joy Division regrouped under the moniker New Order and became the most important of the synth–based post–punk groups. Also worth mentioning are Erasure and The Pet Shop Boys, who best exemplify the new wave sensibilities face of the planet only to come back with Second Coming — a pitiful attempt to recapture their past glory. The Stone Roses were as happy as the Smiths were bleak. They offered classics like She Bangs The Drums, Made Of Stone and Elephant Stone that were the sweetest pop songs I had ever heard. The Smiths gave me a perspective on life and The Stone Roses made me want to live it.

In the early '90s, Bristol, England spawned the burgeoning trip hop movement, giving the world the downtempo, jazz–, funk– and soul–inflected experimental breakbeat music pioneered by the ingenious collective of sonic auteurs known originally as the Wild Bunch and eventually Massive Attack (which originally included Tricky), as well as Portishead. Tricky's debut solo release, 1995's Maxinquaye, is one of the most vital albums of the decade and a monumental achievement in hallucinatory soundscapes.

While no bands matched the Stone Roses or The Smiths there were a host of other bands waiting for me to discover. There were the Psychedelic Furs who had reached main stream status with there hit single "Pretty In Pink" off of Talk Talk Talk. Richard Butler was a lyrical genius who possessed the ability to talk about relationships in ways that few artists can. However, I was simply too young to understand what he was talking about and his ability went wasted on my inexperienced years. Yet the music of the Furs matched the sadness of the Smiths with the pop sensibilities of the Stone Roses that pleased my young ears.

The parade of British bands continued as I expanded my listening scope to bands like The Cure, Depeche Mode, Sundays, Erasure, New Order, The Charlatans, Jesus and Mary Chain and The Pet Shop Boys. The Sundays displayed pure pop bliss on Reading, Writing, and Arithmetic with Harriet Wheeler's vocals providing the perfect soundtrack for a beautiful spring day. The Charlatans were another band that I was hooked on almost instantaneously. With lyrics bleaker then Morrissey's, but with perfect shoegazing music, they were easily one of the best bands from this scene. I was never quite enamored with the electronic music of bands like Erasure, New Order, The Pet Shop Boys, or Depeche Mode beyond their obvious hits, but I have to admit that I owned at least one album by each of those artists.

Although no other British pop artist ever matched The Smiths or The Stone Roses, none of them had to. British pop in the '80s was bleak and beautiful, they rid themselves of the cheesy lyrics that dominated American pop for a more realistic view of life. Yet despite their morose lyrics, the bands never forgot how to write great pop tunes, and that is what ultimately made the songs stick in your head. British pop saved my younger years. Even if you don't want to admit it, I guarantee most of you owned at least one album I've mentioned.

Davey Johnson leaves Orioles

By David Ginsburg
Associated Press

BALTIMORE — Baltimore Orioles manager Davey Johnson resigned yesterday following two successful seasons in which he clashed with owner Peter Angelos.

Angelos received Johnson's letter of resignation late yesterday afternoon. Johnson, who led the Orioles to the best record in the AL this season, had one season remaining on a three-year contract. No successor was named, although pitching coach Ray Miller and batting coach Rick Down are considered strong candidates.

Toronto general manager Gord Ash said he would be interested in interviewing Johnson for the vacant Blue Jays' managerial spot. In a telephone interview yesterday morning with The Associated Press from his home in Florida, Johnson expressed frustration over his uncertain status and said he was approaching the point where resigning was a viable option.

"This has been difficult for me. I am close to the point of thinking that maybe it is time to make a change or move on," Johnson said. "After the two years we just had, I was hopeful we'd be one happy family."

Baltimore reached the AL championship series in 1996 and 1997, only to lose both times. At 98-64, the Orioles had the No. 2 record in baseball behind the Atlanta Braves and became only the third AL team to stay in first from start to finish.

Yet Angelos and Orioles fans expected the team to reach the World Series. Soon after Cleveland eliminated Baltimore 4-2 in the championship series, the situation began to unravel for Johnson, who was dismissed as manager of the New York Mets and the Cincinnati Reds despite success with both teams.

Two days after the World Series, Johnson had his agent send Angelos a fax requesting a contract extension or a buyout of the final year of Johnson's contract. A day later, word leaked that Johnson fined second baseman Roberto Alomar $10,500 for missing an exhibition game and a team banquet, and then asked the player to give the money to a charity that retains Johnson's wife as a fund-raiser.

That enraged Angelos, who said the money belonged to the Orioles and that Johnson had committed "an infraction of serious proportions." Johnson said he was merely trying to make something good come out of a bad situation and had done nothing wrong. "I can't believe it," Orioles first baseman Rafael Palmeiro told WBAL radio. "I really hate to see him go."

O'Donnell out, Foley in for Jets

By Barry Wilner
Associated Press

HEMPSTEAD, N.Y. — Glenn Foley is producing. Neil O'Donnell isn't — at least not the way Bill Parcells wants him to. So Foley will be the starting quarterback for the New York Jets on Sunday at Miami.

While O'Donnell, who earns $5 million a year, becomes the most expensive backup in NFL history, Foley moves from effective relief pitcher to starter.

"Obviously, Bill has confidence in my ability to move the team and to put some points on the board," Foley said yesterday after the coach announced the switch. Foley replaced O'Donnell in the Jets' last two games and led them to victories, vaulting them to the top of the AFC East.

"I want to play. We've got two different quarterbacks he feels can win and he just went with me. That's the way the coach works. If things are not going well, he will be making a change and that goes for everyone, including Neil and me."

While Parcells continued emphasizing that the move is for this one game, it's become obvious that O'Donnell's indecisiveness irked the coach. He likes the way Foley has taken charge of situations in a comeback win over New England — three TDs in the second half — and in leading the Jets (6-3) to an overtime field goal against Baltimore.

"He has done a consistently good job for us and I always have felt good about him," Parcells said. "That's not to say I haven't felt good about Neil; I did. I am just telling you in my heart this is what I feel like.

"You can put up a lot of numbers to make this decision appear to be right or wrong. I don't care; you do what is best momentarily and I am not worried about the long-term effect of this. Things change and two weeks, three weeks is a lifetime in this game. What appears to be one way this week might be different later on. I have just been watching the player perform and he has done a good job when I have put him in there."

Now in his fourth NFL season, Foley started three games at the end of last season. But they were for the worst team in the league. Now he takes over a first-place club playing a second-place team in a tight division race.

O'Donnell, who joined the Jets as a $25 million free agent after leading the Steelers to the 1995 AFC title, has had a rough go in New York. He played in just six games last year, sidelined by shoulder, then foot injuries.

Horoscopes

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — Your first or second choices may be unavailable to you today, so you'll have to trust that your third will suffice — and indeed it will.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — One major mistake today can put you behind schedule, but if you work hard and diligently you can make up for lost time by day's end.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — Your plans are not carved in stone today. You must be willing to be more flexible than you have been in the recent past.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — Preparation is the key to success today. You needn't follow the rules at every moment, but you can relay on them to see you through.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — Solving a problem today will be very much like putting together a complex puzzle. One or two pieces may be difficult to get into place.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — Others may not be acting in a manner that is suitable to current conditions, and it's up to you to see that adjustments are made as necessary.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You might have to spend more time than expected helping someone close to you overcome a personal obstacle. You can learn a lot.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — Time spent with a loved one is never time wasted — and today, even though you may have to set aside important work, you'll want to spend that time.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — You are after something that is more conducive to increased security in and around the home. Keep striving; it's within reach.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — Prepare yourself for a surprise today. The very thing you've been expecting may be upon you a little later than anticipated.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You needn't keep your private affairs entirely to yourself today. Sharing your problems with certain people can bring about a solution.

BU football a ghost for Halloween

BOSTON — On Halloween Night, the Boston University students showed up at Walter Brown Arena in costume for that night's hockey game against UMass. Perhaps the most poignant out of the group was one student dressed in a blood–splattered ghost costume with "BU Football" written across the front.

Members of the Terrier football team are presently dead men walking, a term often used to describe condemned Death Row inmates. With the stunning announcement last week that the program and its 91–year history will end after this season, the collegiate sports world has stood up and taken notice of the historically–average I–AA program like never before.

Leigh Torbin

Some might have thought that this move could never possibly get noticed. BU's entire home attendance total for all of last season (19,536) was only 4,335 more than the Terriers' single–game crowd here at UMass last year (15,201 for Band Day).

The nation, however, is stunned. The school spends $2.9 million a year on football and returns almost nothing, but rather than see the non–financial benefits of football, BU axed the team. The school will give $500,000 a year in badly–needed funds to support its women's teams, in the name of title IX, and redistribute the rest.

Coach Tom Masella, who came in last year after being told that the school was committed to its program, was lied to and now has no team to coach.

Furthermore, the manner in which this was handled was absolutely pathetic. Rather than do this before or after the season, the powers that be at BU decided to go into the Terrier locker room after losing 28–7 to Northeastern on Homecoming and do the dirty deed. If you're a player, the old stand–by BU taunt rang true.

It sucks to BU.

The university offered the players their scholarships and said that they would honor the remaining two years of Masella's contract but that offer was received like Pee Wee Herman auditioning to be John McClaine in Die Hard 4.

The response from the BU players was enough to garner national attention on the field for the first time since the team's miracle 1993 NCAA Tournament run. The Terriers played in white shirts with black numbers and solid red helmets with any and all references to their university crossed off or eliminated. The team asked to be referred to as "University X," and were obliged, Joe Burris referring to the team formerly known as the Terriers as the "X–Men" in his game story for The Boston Globe.

"I think they did college football proud today," Masella said. "I was proud of them. I stand by my players. I have to. But there was no way we could be prepared to play a team like UConn after this circus atmosphere."

There's this guy who used to coach basketball here who was always fond of referring to his program as being a "front porch" to the university. His team isn't the focal point, but it can initially draw someone in to take a look around the place that otherwise might have walked on by.

Because, when you get right down to it, everything loses money at a university. Yeah, the Athletic Department loses money, but so does the Sociology Department, Biology Department and even the Accounting Department, no matter what fancy ledgers and numbers they throw at you.

People root for college teams ahead of pro teams because, unlike the Hartford Whalers and Houston Oilers, they aren't going to the highest bidder. The Atlanta Braves once called BU's Nickerson Field (then Braves Field) home before fleeing to Milwaukee in 1953. But, people root for BU because the assumption is that the Terriers will always be there, but some short–sighted administrators saw otherwise.

T. Anthony's Pizzaria, home of the best chicken parm sub in the hub, has been in operation across from Nickerson Field almost since the Puritans founded the City of Boston in 1630. The walls of the quintessential BU athletic hang–out are plastered with autographed photos of those who have gone there before.

Along with BU athletic legends, the photos date back to when the Braves called Agganis Way home.

While old shots of Braves players, like Warren Spahn and Johnny Sain, also adorn the walls, they were as much a legend on that Halloween Night as the Headless Horseman of Sleepy Hollow. Long gone, but not forgotten.

This pizza joint is where they used to live, but young people must be told this. Next month, the Terriers and Braves will be one, united as ghosts (like at the hockey game) haunting Nickerson Field.

Hot Stove baseball; expansion and realignment top list

Luke Meredith & Fred Hurlbrink, Jr. on Major League Baseball

The most depressing thing about November is the sad realization that there are four months to wait until spring training. So as the 1997 season fades into memory, Fred and I leave you with a little something to mull over during another long winter.

1. Was interleague play actually a success, and should it continue?

Fred Hurlbrink, Jr: Did the Royals play the Cubs? Somewhere along the road a teacher once told me that you can't answer a question with another question, but I beg to differ.

The owners were grasping at straws to get butts back in the seats — now they have to realign the divisions to unbalance the schedule and make division games actually meaningful. Fans came to the games, owners made some more money and American League pitchers had to hit.

Luke Meredith: Watching the Royals play the Cubs is more exciting than watching the Royals play the Twins. I guess. Hey, it's different, and the fans seem to love it.

2. Is expansion good for baseball, and what will happen in the expansion draft?

Hurlbrink: Expansion wouldn't be so bad if there wasn't so much teal involved, but the more bright ideas baseball's "brain trust" comes up with, the more trouble they seem to get into. Two more teams means more money and more revenue to share — the bottom line is the bottom line. And the Pittsburgh Pirates will still be digging under couch cushions for change.

The expansion draft could be wild. Mediocre teams with little direction — like the Red Sox — stand to lose the most "talent." Over–priced pitchers will be prominent on the draft lists, but the Devil Rays and the Diamondbacks will be challenged by GMs that have done this just five years ago.

Meredith: I love expansion, because it brings the game into new areas. The one thing baseball has done right is expansion, unlike other leagues. Both Florida and Colorado have been successes, and Phoenix and Tampa Bay have the base support, both financially and fan–wise, to become top clubs in the next decade.

The expansion draft won't have much of an impact, unless someone makes a huge mistake and leaves significant talent unprotected. Expansion clubs now rely on free agents, and the money the Rays and Diamondbacks will bring in thanks to sweet deals with Tampa and Phoenix will determine their future, at least in the short–term. Long term is in the minor leagues, but that's everyone's worry, not just expansion teams.

3. What is all this realignment fuss?

Hurlbrink: It's ridiculous. Let's make one big league and you can all chose whether or not you want to use the DH. Every team can get into the playoffs and we'll cut the World Series down to best–of–three or better yet, let's flip a coin in April and not bother playing the season. All contracts are guaranteed these days anyway.

Meredith: If they're going to do it, moving one team just doesn't cut it. Baseball needs to make a decision about its future, and move forward with consistency. Nibbling at change isn't change. It's indecision.

4. When will the Red Sox be good?

Hurlbrink: Sooner than later. Pedro Martinez would help, but another Jeff Bagwell trade should be avoided. The foundation is there (Carl Pavano, Brian Rose, Michael Coleman, some Nomar guy) and Dan Duquette — despite the impression he gives — is a very intelligent baseball man. Finally letting Wilfredo Cordero go was a step in the right direction.

If Mo Vaughn goes, he'll bring a big–time player in return, so don't worry about losing him. Nomar is here to stay — he'll be MVP someday.

Meredith: Not until they fire Dan Duquette.

5. Who's going to win the 1998 World Series?

Hurlbrink: Well, I'll tell ya' what... it won't be the Cubs. This is sketchy, picking the '98 series before the dust has even settled on this one, but I'm going to go with the Yankees to not make the playoffs (thought I was gonna give 'em the trophy?). The Mariners are the only AL team that won't suffer a significant off–season personnel loss, so we'll pit them up against the Dodgers who will stop underachieving finally and win the World Series, I guess.

Meredith: Guess what? The Braves are still the best team in baseball. Don't think they'll forget what happened in the NLCS. Florida is still a mess, especially without Alex Fernandez for the year. San Francisco will be hard pressed to repeat last year's success, and the Dodgers need to get out of this underachieving rut. In the AL, the Orioles are still good but they'll slip, as will New York. Seattle needs to find pitching to complement that lineup, and Cleveland will have to bolster that rotation.

Braves over the Mariners, 4–1.

AFC East heats up, Harbaugh vs. Kelly, Dan vs. Tuna

Jamie Jee on the NFL

Ah, the AFC East.

Ah, those Pats.

Many New Englanders are starting to get that fuzzy feeling in their stomach after their Patriots' recent stumble which enabled the New York Jets to sit atop the division. Head coach Bill Parcells has seemed magical, with his cast of vagabonds including former Boston College QB Glen Foley and Keyshawn "Give me the damn ball" Johnson. Foley has bailed out veteran Neil O'Donnell to grab the last two victories, and some newfound pressure.

Both the Pats and Tuna may soon see some division shuffling, however. This Sunday the Jets travel to Miami to face Jimmy Johnson's Dolphins, who should have Dan Marino despite his bad ankle.

The Pats are on the road against Buffalo, led by none other than college standout Alex Van Pelt, who broke most of Marino's records at Pittsburgh. Some may be looking down the road to New England's Week 12 visit to Tampa Bay, but I think we've learned not to count our chickens before they hatch. The Pats will look for a few more picks this weekend. In their first six games, they forced 16 turnovers, but have managed only one in three consecutive losses.

The Bills remained focused last week after the Harbaugh–Kelly brawl and Bruce Smith has been sack–happy as of late. He leads the AFC's No. 1 defense and the league with 11 sacks.

Harbaugh won't be able to lead the Colts to their first win this week end, he's out with a broken hand and fill–in quarterback Kelly Holcomb will get the nod. Cincinnati will send running back Ki–Jana Carter at the weak Indy line early and often and hope that quarterback Jeff Blake can get back on track as they haven't seen too many touchdown passes from him as of yet. This game should be close. All five games between the Bengals and Colts since 1992 have been decided by seven points or fewer.

Smith and other defensive backs have demolished quarterbacks this season, either by injury or performance. The Chief's Elvis Grbac was the latest addition after he was crunched in their Monday Night Football win over the Steelers. Backup Rich Gannon will have to step in for 3–4 weeks. Kansas City can celebrate the breaking of a bad tradition for them as Pittsburgh had been 7–0 at Arrowhead Stadium. The Chiefs visit the Jaguars this week, while Pittsburgh hosts Baltimore for the Sunday night game.

That recently overlooked other New York team, the Giants, are 6–3 and hold a one–game lead over Washington in the NFC East. Head coach Jim Fassel said that it was too early to establish the goal of winning the division, although he said the players have already done that. Jim, I'd let 'em go — it's worked so far. They visit the cozy confines of the Liberty Bowl at Memphis this week, where rushing is the only thing keeping the Oilers alive. They're third in the conference on both offense and defense.

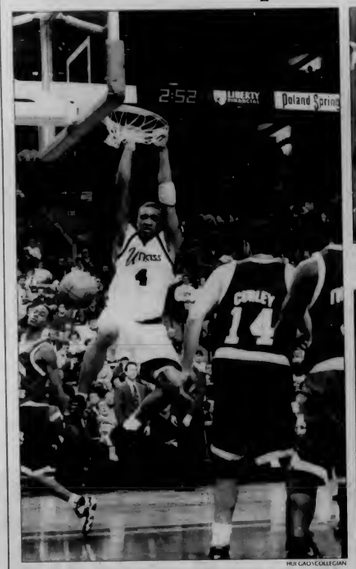
The word from camp Ditka is that Danny Wuerffel's out and former Volunteer Heath Shuler is in. Neither has lived up to his collegiate promise, but both have played for the Saints. I don't know whether to criticize them or feel sorry for them. (You can bet fellow Volunteer Peyton Manning has heard enough stories from his dad to not make the same mistake.) They take on the D–deficient Raiders at Oakland.

Ditka's old team, the Chicago Bears, travel to Minnesota to face the Vikings and now–controversial head coach Dennis Green. His new book, No Room for Crybabies, and his no–show for a monthly meeting has caused the NFL to impose a gag order on Green and Viking owners. Green reportedly threatened legal action if board members didn't sell him their intcrests. The only action the Bears have to worry about will be from Brad Johnson and Cris Carter.

There may be a big party in Arizona this Sunday if the Cardinals beat the Cowboys on the road. Don't count on it though, because even though Emmitt Smith's questionable with a muscle strain, tackle Mark Tuinei is done for the season (knee) and guard Nate Newton's play will be limited with a bone bruise, home–state hero Jake Plummer has been sacked 12 times in the last two games and the Cowboys defense is much more intact than their offense has been.

Detroit's Barry Sanders has refused to slow down this year. Sanders went for 105 last week against Green Bay to give him seven consecutive 100–yard games. That put him in some select company (as if he wasn't already there) as he tied Earl Cambell and O.J. Simpson for third. Chiefs running back Marcus Allen tops the list with 11 while Walter Payton sits at second with nine. He'll look to grab sole possession of third place on that list against Washington Sunday.

Watch that game because if someone tells Barry that the Lions have lost 17 consecutive games to the Redskins he may just rush for 200. He should pass Tony Dorsett for third on the all–time rushing list and further imprint his name in the record books by rushing for an unprecedented ninth consecutive 1,000 yard season.



Picks of the Week: I'll take the Pats over the Bills and Detroit to break their losing streak to Washington. Steve Young and the 49ers will outshoot whoever Ray Rhodes sends against them and RB Garrison Hearst should run through the Eagles mediocre line.

Quote of the Week: "I don't like living with this cloud hanging over us. This isn't the way I pictured my team or my coaching to be."

We'll look for sunshine this week, Pete.

House supports human rights action

WASHINGTON (AP) — The House voted overwhelmingly yesterday to bar Chinese officials from the United States, accusing them of "the worst human rights abuses in the world."

Employing heated rhetoric and comparing communist China to the Nazi regime, lawmakers forcefully rejected President Clinton's efforts to work closer with Beijing to promote greater freedom through greater contact.

"It is absurd and nonsensical to argue that these brutal thugs will change their ways if they simply come to the United States and enjoy some Chablis and California cuisine with the people here," declared Rep. Dana Rohrabacher (R–Calif.) "We don't want the Adolf Eichmanns of this generation to visit the United States at taxpayers' expense."

Eichmann implemented the Nazi extermination of 6 million Jews. A package of nine China bills gave lawmakers two days to berate the Chinese government over human rights just a week after Clinton met with President Jiang Zemin at the White House. House Speaker Newt Gingrich (R–Ga.) put off the debate in deference to the Chinese leader's state visit.

Marv Albert speaks on "20/20"

NEW YORK (AP) — Making what has become an obligatory stop for disgraced public figures seeking redemption, Marv Albert sat down with Barbara Walters for his first interview since his sexual biting trial. But instead of pleading for forgiveness, he accused his accuser of lying.

"I thought she was my friend. What happened, what she did to me, is just unbelievable," Albert said in the interview to be broadcast on ABC's "20/20" tonight.

Albert said he had a "purely sexual" 10–year relationship with Vanessa Perhach and suggested that she brought forcible sodomy charges against him because she knew he was about to get engaged to someone else.

"She was trying to extort me," he said.

The 56–year–old sportscaster was accused of throwing the woman on a bed in a Virginia hotel room last February, biting her on the back more than a dozen times and forcing her to perform oral sex. Lurid allegations at his trial about his kinky sex life led him to abruptly plead guilty to assault and battery. He offered a grudging apology and was spared jail time if he stays out of trouble for a year.

Less than two weeks after his sentencing, Albert has launched a media tour that will include interviews with Larry King, David Letterman and Katie Couric of the "Today" show during the next week.

Faculty Senate denounces Carlin

By Tamar Carroll
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Faculty Senate yesterday denounced the recent call of James Carlin, chairman of the Board of Higher Education, to eliminate academic tenure as "ill–informed, inaccurate, irresponsible, and inappropriate."

At yesterday's Faculty Senate meeting, the Senate voted unanimously to condemn Carlin's call for the elimination of academic tenure at all public institutions of higher education in the Commonwealth and to forward their condemnation to the President of the University, the Board of Trustees and the Board of Higher Education.

Professor Joseph Larson, chair of the Senate Rules Committee and author of the motion to "deplore and reject" Carlin's remarks, said it was crucial for the Senate to respond swiftly to Carlin.

"I want to go after that man and that Board because they are irresponsible," Larson said. "We have to say that and take the fight to them."

In a speech delivered Tuesday Nov. 4, to the Greater Boston Chamber of Commerce, Carlin made six recommendations for improving public higher education in the state, including discontinuing academic tenure and increasing the amount of teaching full–time professors do.

"Tenure is a lifetime job guarantee and it's wrong," Carlin said. "Get rid of tenure. It is an absolute scam."

Carlin also recommended that professors choose either a teaching track or a research track.

"I am going to recommend... a two–track career system for younger

Plan for parking garage debated at Town Meeting

By Paul Hayes
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — As part of the continuing saga that is the Amherst downtown parking problem, one of two designs for a possible parking garage at Boltwood Walk was presented to Amherst Town Meeting on Wednesday night.

Architect Peter Kitcheli presented his plan — the smaller of two proposed parking garage plans. It would reconfigure the current parking layout and add an underground parking structure to Boltwood Walk, the area located behind Antonio's and Barselotti's, where Pinnochio's and Bueno Y Sano are located.

Under the Kitchell plan, 215 spaces would be allotted for parking, an increase of 125 more spaces than currently at Boltwood Walk.

The other plan, designed by the Meyer and Meyer architectural firm, consists of a multi–deck garage and would allow for the creation of 202 more parking spaces for the Boltwood Walk area.

The Meyer plan has received the support of the Amherst Select Board, and was endorsed by 200 Amherst residents and town center area businesses in a recent full page ad taken out in the Amherst Bulletin.

The Kitchell plan has the support of the Amherst Finance Committee, and was granted several procedural motions which could give it the tactical advantage of being voted on by Town Meeting after the other Meyer plan.

If the Meyer plan is rejected, it could be seen by town meeting members as better than no garage at all.

Many proponents support the Kitchell plan b ecause of its aesthetic value, and accessibility to pedestrians.

The Kitchell plan has the potential of transforming the Boltwood Walk area from a run down lot into a community asset, said Norton Juster in a presentation on the plans behalf.

"[Kitchell's] is a joyful and preservative plan which meets the character of the town," Juster said. "[The Meyer plan] obliterates Boltwood Walk as a pedestrian area and turns it into an eyesore."

Kitchell himself described the central area of the above ground portion of the lot, containing a pool and walkways across a raised island, as a gathering space, quiet space and performance space.

Yet some said that another park area is not what the town needs.

Relaxing in the middle of a parking garage is not as desirable as visiting other local parks Precinct 5 Town Meeting Member Larry Kelly said.

He also said that it won't be practical to grow trees on the street level above garage, such as Kitchell's plan proposes.

Advising Resources sets up new web site made to help students

By Leigh Faulkner
Collegian Staff

Beginning today, students at the University of Massachusetts will gain access to a new tool to guide them in their quest for information surrounding advising, the Undergraduate Advising Resources web page, which was designed to help students find campus information without contacting many different departments.

The Resource Network, the organization responsible for designing the site, is a campus organization composed of students, faculty and staff that is committed to improving the condition of campus life and living.

The 10–member web site working group from the Resource Network issued a press release stating, "This web site is part of ongoing efforts to create a UMass 'intranet,' a web–based approach to quickly accessing campus information and resources in key functional areas like undergraduate advising."

The web site, which is divided into four areas of advising; academic, personal, career and resource contains information ranging from major requirements to study skills, from job opportunities to confidential counseling assistance, and from public safety information to campus policies and procedures.

In addition students can also send e–mail directly to their chief undergraduate advisor and other organizations on campus from the web site.

Students can connect to the web site directly at www.umass.edu/urn/advising, or they can chose to go through the UMass homepage at www.umass.edu, where the Undergraduate Advising Resources page can be accessed through Academic and Research, Student Info or Admissions.

"We know from research that advising needs improving and this web site is one way to help that process," said Grant Ingle, Director of Human Resources and member of the web site working group.

Ingle explained that there is a consensus among students that advisors are knowledgeable within their own field.

"However, when students begin asking questions about other departments advisors are not so sure," he said.

Next Wednesday Nov. 12, the Resource Network is sponsoring a meeting in Studio C 114 in Marcus

Fraternity to sponsor 2nd annual Black and Gold

Alpha Kappa Chapter celebrates its 75th anniversary with formal

By Gregory H. Casimir
Collegian Staff

On Sunday Nov. 9, the brothers of Alpha Phi Alpha Fraternity, Inc., will sponsor its second annual Black and Gold: "An Evening on the Nile" formal in the Campus Center.

The Alpha Kappa Chapter, seated at the University of Massachusetts, will be celebrating its 75th anniversary and commemorating their long history of community service, and ongoing promotion of cultural awareness.

"All are welcome," said AK Chapter President Kola Olosunde, a senior. "Come share in the spirit of Alpha, enjoy the hospitality of AK Chapter, and witness the legacy that is Alpha Phi Alpha."

The fraternity has steadily grown since its inception in 1906. One hundred fifty thousand men have been initiated into the Alpha Phi Alpha Fraternity since 1906, and now there exists 350 chapters on college campuses and 350 alumni chapters in local communities. 44 states, the Caribbean, Europe, Asia and Africa.

The event is a dedication to this legacy. But it also provides a rare opportunity to recognize those individuals and organizations that provide a noteworthy service to the campus community.

Sidonio Ferreria, now the head of operations for the Campus Center, received the 1906 Award last year on behalf of the CCEBMS, which was recognized for their continual service to the ALANA community. He expressed his delight at being part of the ceremony.

"I thought it was an extremely positive event. It was really nice to see different people from the African Diaspora getting together to learn about their culture," Ferreria said. "It was nice to see good people from the community being recognized."

The brothers of Phi Beta Sigma Fraternity, Inc., received last year's Community Service Award, and the award for community upliftment was given to the ALANA Caucus.

This year's event will also include a Million Man March Art Mural presented by Nelson Stevens of the Afro–Am department. He is also a member of Alpha Phi Alpha.

The evening will begin with "Dinner on the Nile," which will include catered vegetarian and West Indian dishes. Performing live jazz music during dinner will be Herman Hampton's Quartet.

Next, the evening will open up with the keynote address given by Darnell Williams, a man who has occupied many illustrious positions in the black community. Among the many, Williams was the President of the Springfield Branch of the NAACP in 1996, and the Chairperson of the Mayor's Task Force on Children and Youth Needs in 1993.

After this, the 1906 Award and the Community Upliftment Awards will be given out, recognizing the achievements of this year's community leaders and organizations.

Following the commemoration will be the Black and Gold Presentation, the entertainment portion of the evening. The Boundaries Soul Choir will be performing for the first time, and also scheduled to perform are "Negres Kreyol" of the Haitian American Student Association, NYC+1, an African Drum and Jazz band, Def Jam Comedians, and a step show.

The evening will end with a "Party on the Nile." DJ Rick will be spinning the sounds of slow jams, R&B, Reggae, hip–hop, and old school.

"The Evening on the Nile" has become one of the most highly praised formal events on campus since it began last year.

Ricardo Townes, Vice Chancellor of Campus Activities, conveyed his opinion on the impact that the "Evening on the Nile" left on him.

"I've been on campus for 22 years, and I've been to a lot of events, and it was one of the nicest events of its kind that this campus has ever sponsored," he said. "I'm going again this year."

Olosunde extended an invitation to all to attend.

"Programs like this can only continue with community involvement. We welcome everyone."

Iraq's actions a "precaution"

By Wail Faleh
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Insisting that it was only taking precautions against a possible U.S. air strike, Iraq admitted yesterday that it had moved some equipment away from U.N. surveillance cameras.

Weapons inspections were canceled for a fourth straight day yesterday after Iraqis refused to admit American members of the team to the sites.

U.N. monitors accused Iraq of taking advantage of a halt in inspections to disable the cameras and hide key equipment. "It looks a little bit like, 'the cat's away, the mice will play,'" the chief U.N. weapons inspector, Richard Butler, said in New York.

In a carefully worded statement, the Security Council told Iraq to stop tampering with the U.N. surveillance arrangements. It said it "hopes that any recurrence" of those actions "will be avoided" as they were "not in conformity" with U.N. orders. The inspections are meant to Hall to obtain feedback from students, faculty and staff.

The meeting will be conducted with the web page projected and individuals will be asked to voice their opinions about missing or incorrect information, or any other ideas or concerns they may have.

"We want people to give us feedback," said Ingle. "It is important that we get the perspective from students, the ones who receive advising, and from those who do advising."

At the beginning of last semester, a conference was held, at which many recommendations were made concerning advising.

One of these recommendations was the need for the web site which was brought to the Resource Network's attention in April 1997.

Another recommendation was the need for advising training programs to be organized periodically.

In addition to the web site, Resource Network members are also sponsoring a symposium for advisors titled, "When Academic Advising Becomes Personal: Skillful Referrals for Students in Crisis."

The Resource Network and the web site project are sponsored by the Chancellors Counsel on Community Diversity and Social Justice.

check whether Iraq has destroyed all long-range missiles and weapons of mass destruction, including poison gas and lethal biological toxins. That is the key requirement for lifting strict U.N. sanctions imposed after Iraq invaded Kuwait in 1990, touching off the 1991 Persian Gulf War. In Washington, Vice President Al Gore said Saddam "must know that he has to comply with the will of the international community."

"We will make sure that he complies," Gore said.

Iraq denied tampering with the cameras, saying one was damaged when a missile engine exploded during a test. The engine was for a short-range missile that is not banned under U.N. orders.

Iraqi Foreign Minister Mohammed Saeed al-Sahhaf said in a letter to the Security Council that Baghdad took the action only because it feared a U.S. air strike was imminent.

"Therefore, we have taken some measures, which are precisely to move to distant sites the equipment that may have been subject to military attack," he said.

and up–and–coming professors," Carlin said. "Between their third and their seventh year they would be asked to choose whether they want to be a teaching professor or a research professor."

In addition, Carlin recommended the dissolution of presidential search committees and the elimination of "meaningless research."

Numerous Senate members and faculty spoke against Carlin's recommendations.

Senate President James Bracey said it was time for the faculty of the University to stand up to Carlin.

"We have talked to the President's Office before, and they didn't want a public fight over this," Bracey said. "The result is Carlin gets bolder and bolder... I think we should show outrage. I think we have been offended."

Senator Brian O'Connor, the Senate's delegate to the Board of Trustees, agreed with Bracey.

"This man is not acting logically," O'Connor said. "It is like when you are little and there is a bully on the street. It is time to stand up and say we are not what you think we are. We are an excellent University. We have to respond as quickly as possible."

Jenny Spencer, president of the Massachusetts Society of Professors, said she was concerned that Carlin's remarks and his attitude towards faculty in general would have a deleterious effect on the upcoming faculty contract negotiations.

"Carlin is so illogical, it is hard to even attack his comments," Spencer said. "My concern is with the public. He has gotten enormous credibility with the legislature and the public. I think he is a real danger to us. We must expose the incompetence of this person."

The Senate also voted unanimously to have its Graduate, Research and Academic Affairs Councils conduct a study and analysis of the effect of tenure at the University and present their findings to the Senate by January 1998.

Chancellor David K. Scott, who was not in attendance at the Senate meeting, released comments repudiating Carlin's stance.

Scott said that tenure was essential to protect the academic freedom of professors at the University.

"Tenure remains very important for the original reason it was introduced: to protect academic freedom," Scott said. "We need to protect tenure and defend professors' rights to work in politically unpopular areas."

He also disagreed with Carlin's proposal to have teaching track and research track professors.

"A two-track system is not the direction we are moving in. We are looking to build greater synergy between teaching, research and outreach," Scott said. "We are a comprehensive institution where teaching, research and outreach enhance each other and build on each other. We need more collaboration, not more separation."

Professor Robert Costrell praised Scott's responses.

"I think the best defense of tenure has been the level– headed responses of Scott and Provost [Cora] Marrett," Costrell said.

Hillel House memorial held for Yitzhak Rabin

By Anna Glozman
Collegian Correspondent

Two years after the Nov. 4 assassination of Yitzhak Rabin, University of Massachusetts students held a memorial at the Hillel House. About 35 participants gathered to share memories of Rabin: his life, his assassination and the effects of his sudden death.

Freshman Jesse Pasackow, who organized the commemoration, had attended a memorial rally in Israel last year.

"I wanted the memory of Rabin's life to continue," Pasackow said.

He started the service by recalling last year's rally at which Leah Rabin spoke.

"It touched me to see that many people there... 5,000 people there, the streets were crowded," Rabin said. "I never thought that many people could be silent. There was no whispering, and the people who were crying before, you couldn't hear them crying. It was a moment I'll never forget."

Pasackow then lit the Yarzeit candle and sophomore Katie Newman lead the attendants in the traditional Jewish Mourner's Kaddish. The group's voices joined together again in "Shir HaShalom" — the Song of Peace — that was played at the rally where Rabin was murdered.

Freshmen Shira Hutt and Rebecca Rackmill read Shalom Haver (Goodbye, Friend), a book written by Barbara Shofer. The title is the phrase coined by President William J. Clinton at Rabin's funeral. The book asks, "How do you say goodbye to a friend?"

Sophomore Andrea Eisenstein, who was in Israel when Rabin was murdered, spoke of how she felt when she learned of his death. She attended the Shalom Haver concert, In memory of Rabin. Although it was her second year in Israel and she was an outsider, she still "felt like a part of it."

The choral group Kolot (Voices) performed a poem and two songs, including Erev Shel Shoshanim, traditionally a marriage song. A moment of silence was held out of respect for Rabin.

Lissa Loeb, the Jewish Campus Service Corps Fellow, spoke about how Rabin's murder was a defining moment in her life and in the lives of the audience. She pointed out that the songs that were sung that night were about peace and love, and that the Mourner Kaddish never speaks of death, only of life.

Rabin "wasn't killed by one person," Loeb said, "but by an atmosphere [that] allowed name calling." She recalled Rabin's "legacy of peace" and by treating people with respect, "we can remember Rabin daily."

There was a mostly positive reaction to the service. Senior Dan Marshall, an Israeli, said that the service "definitely paid good respect to a good person. People should have more events like that to remember our heroes."

"It's important to come together at a time like this. There's a real sense of loss, and we need to remember it, and not just remember but no give up on peace," said Rabbi Saul Pearlman.

"I felt bad that I didn't know more about Rabin earlier," Rackmill said.

"The service made me think back to the time that it happened and brought back those memories," said sophomore Yoav Gluckman, who was spending a year in Israel at the time of the assassination.

Junior Avi Wolf, co–director of Kolot said, "Our singing brought out emotions I didn't know I had."

President threatens military action against Iraq

By Susanne M. Schafer
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Clinton administration warned Iraq yesterday it could face military action or economic sanctions if it continues to bar U.N. inspections of its weapons facilities. "I think sufficient warnings have been given," Defense Secretary William Cohen told reporters at the Pentagon.

Meanwhile, Pentagon officials canceled a scheduled port call for the aircraft carrier USS Nimitz, keeping it within striking range of Iraq.

The warship had been slated for a rest-stop at the United Arab Emirates in the far southern end of the Gulf over the weekend. The visit has been delayed for an unspecified time, said Pentagon spokesman Kenneth Bacon.

Cohen took time before a Pentagon awards ceremony to assert that Iraq's blockade of U.N. inspection teams and its admitted tampering with surveillance cameras are clear violations of the 1991 cease-fire accords that ended the Persian Gulf War.

"This is not a negotiable item," Cohen said of Iraq's refusal to admit U.S. members of the United Nations weapons inspection teams. "It is imperative that Iraq comply with U.N. mandates." The defense secretary said the United States will wait to take any action until it sees reports from a U.N. team currently in Baghdad.

"There is sufficient time to consider a whole panoply" of steps that might be taken, Cohen said.

Asked whether those include U.S. military strikes, the defense secretary said: "They could include further economic measures. They could include military as well."

The impasse apparently is allowing the Iraqis to avoid inspections and hide equipment at suspected arms sites. U.N. officials have also delayed flights of the American U-2 surveillance planes while the U.N. delegation is in Iraq.

"It is a real setback," Bacon said of the delayed inspections. For the fourth time yesterday, Saddam Hussein barred U.S. members of an international weapons inspection team from entering the Persian Gulf country to look for biological and chemical weapons. The Iraqi president claims the Americans are bent on spying. The chief weapons inspector, Richard Butler, suspended U.N. weapons inspections last week after Baghdad ordered American members of the inspection teams out of the country, precipitating the current standoff.

"There is no substitute for actually getting into buildings. We need eyeball-to-eyeball studies, and that's why it's absolutely crucial" the United Nations inspections continue, Bacon said. He charged the Iraqis with attempting to maintain capabilities to build Scud missiles and renew production of chemical and biological weapons.

U.N. sanctions and inspections "are valuable because they do prevent Iraq from developing weapons of mass destruction," Bacon said.

"You need a cubic yard of dirt which weighs as much as a Toyota, and I would rather park my Toyota there than have a cubic yard of dirt," Kelly said.

Yet a garage would eliminate the openness and connection the open space of Boltwood Walk provides Amherst center, Kitchell said.

The Kitchell plan also allows for current businesses adjoining Boltwood Walk on the North Pleasant Street side to develop their lands up to their property lines.

The Meyer plan, since it is above ground and up to the property lines of businesses, requires a 20–foot buffer zone between the garage and all future developments, limiting companies potential development space.

The garage will be paid for by $3 million dollar given by the state, with the remaining necessary funds provided by Amherst town parking revenue, parking tickets and tax funds.

Cost estimates place the Kitchell plan at $4 million, and the Meyer and Meyer plan at $4.8 million, figures the Amherst Redevelopment Authority (ARA) stated may not be accurate.

The ARA owns land essential to the construction of a parking facility on Boltwood Walk, and has said it approves of the Meyer plan, which members have said better meets the ARA's.

The position has been taken by the ARA as a whole that they will give the land over to the town for the Meyer plan, but will charge the city for the land if the Kitchell plan is approved.

Costs to the city could be upwards of $300,000 according to some estimates.

Alan Root, a Town Meeting from precinct five, cautioned the meeting that the town could be in the middle of parking garage hysteria.

"Looking at the quality of the financial information [for the garage plans]," Root said, "I'm not satisfied at all with either proposal."

Alan Peterfreund of precinct two presented financial information contrasting the plans.

Peterfreund's figures estimated that the Meyer plan's above ground parking platform will cost $1 million, where as Kitchell's park landscaping will cost $250,000.

This is the difference in the two plans, Peterfreund said.

According to Peterfreund, even if the Meyer garage averages a 75 percent occupation capacity, it will only average 40 percent of it's financial capacity due to free or reduced parking for town employees and senior citizens.

Snow days will also affect profits, with six snow days reducing the garages income by 2 percent, Peterfreund said.

Financing for the larger garage plan will also be more expensive, Peterfreund said.

An underground connection to the Bangs center not included in the Meyer plan is a part of the Kitchell plan.

The Town Meeting will reconvene to discuss the parking garage issue on Wednesday, November 12 at 7:30 p.m. at the Amherst Regional Middle School.

Family values suppress women

Jill Carroll

Remember back a few years ago when Dan Quayle got his "tighty-whities" all in a bunch over Murphy Brown? The TV character, Murphy Brown, had a child out of wedlock on the prime time show. Quayle said it was encouraging the breakdown of already eroded "family values" in America.

This produced a family values bandwagon that was popular with the American public and had every politician in sight jumping on. But this wholesome bandwagon bumping down every campaign trail is bumping women back into a very tight spot.

In the 60s, women saw they could have a valid career outside the home. As a result, more and more women started going to college and taking up positions of authority and influence in America's job market. Then, by the strangest coincidence, just at the time when women became a major force in the job world, threatening corporate, yes even government positions once held by men, this crisis arose.

This crisis of families breaking down and the next generation going haywire has everyone bemoaning the loss of the happy family of the 50s. Fingers start pointing as to whom is to blame for this sudden change. The blame falls on the growing number of families that have both parents working outside the home. Kids don't get the guidance and support they need because the parents are at work.

But read between the lines here. Since the father has always worked outside the home and families were stable in the past with that, then what is the change that suddenly happened and caused a breakdown in families? Who are they really saying is to blame for changing things and causing this breakdown? The millions of women who now have jobs outside the home, that's who.

These millions of women are painted as doing damage to their children and ultimately families by not taking care of all the housework themselves. They are leaving children at a very early age to be cared for by babysitters, day care centers and Barney. These latch-key kids, wasting hours and minds in front of the TV, are seen as victims of their mothers' career ambitions. Because they don't have a strong bond to the mother, they grow up without good values or a sense of good judgement of right and wrong. It seems to be said that they have a weaker moral fiber because of this, and accounts for the falling test scores and rising crime and drug rates.

It seems implied that women as mothers have a very strong influence on their children if their absence can cause such a crisis. And so they should stay home to keep their families, and indeed the very moral fiber of America, together.

But if you look at a woman who is a housewife, entrusted with all this responsibility (after all, she's caring for and has the well being of America's future in her hands) she is shown no respect. To be a housewife is not considered an occupation. The work is considered menial and mindless, undeserving of respect.

Now we have a problem. If a woman has a career, is making money and is being influential she is blamed for abandoning her family and contributing to the breakdown of "family values" in America. And that contradicts the idea that being a housewife is a non-job, which is what everyone acts like it is. So as a woman, the question becomes, what are you supposed to do? Often times the answer is: everything. But for someone to work an eight-hour day, then put in another six hours of housework is not an answer.

This is a difficult question. There doesn't seem to be an answer that is right in everyone's eyes. Perhaps that's because all those eyes watching are all the men that aren't factored in as an answer to this question. Perhaps if all those men in Washington took those fingers they've been pointing and used them to do the dishes, laundry or hug their children, things would not be so difficult.

Killing the killers is no solution

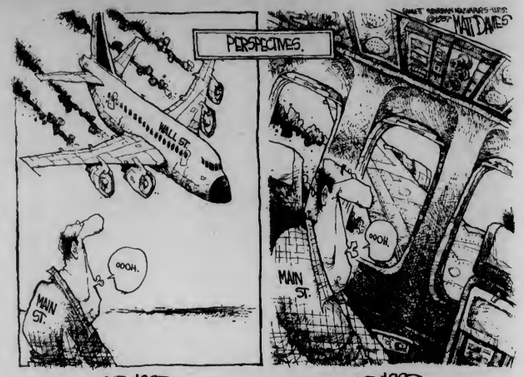
Boomer Pinches

Last week was a bad week. It started with a message on my machine from Cameron Diaz, who says she's met someone else and doesn't want to see me anymore. For this I left Leonardo DiCaprio? Then I hear Johnny Lydon's gonna settle his legal disputes on "Judge Judy" this month (okay, that one I'm kinda looking forward to). Somebody stole my Autobot Underoos out of the wash. And to top it all off, the people of Massachusetts, fed up with senseless killing, have voted to reinstate the death penalty.

Hmmm...

I have yet to be convinced of the logic behind capital punishment. If putting a murderer to death would bring back his or her victims, I can see how it would make sense. Last time I checked, that wasn't the case: the dead stay dead and we are left with the living. Most people are sickened by the disregard for human life that leads one human being to murder another; why, then, do so many of these people treat the life of a killer with the same disregard? Almost anyone can imagine a situation in which they would feel justified killing another human being (defense of self, defense of loved ones). It's only when someone commits murder for reasons society does not accept that the public's sense of moral outrage is incensed. "We decide," the masses scream, "who will live and who will die."

I also can't help thinking that many of the people who support the death penalty would vote differently if they were called upon to perform the execution themselves. We have jury duty in this country, why not execution duty for everyone who votes in favor of capital punishment? Oh, but wait, that would be barbaric. Let us instead allow the government to do our dirty work for us, using well-polished machines and hypodermic needles filled with poison, while we sit in our comfortable living rooms with a ball game on TV and nary a stain on our conscience.



To be clear, I am not defending the act of murder. I condemn it not for moral reasons — which are unreliable and constantly subject to revision, as last week's reversal of the state death penalty (to say nothing of phenomena like Naziism) demonstrates — but on the grounds of common sense. We are all conscious because we are alive; dead, we're nothing. (Yeah, okay, maybe there's an afterlife, but how eager are we to find out?) Ergo, few people want to be dead. And because geography and biology have forced so many of us to interact with each other on a constant basis, we'd better get used to respecting each other's right to live and find ways of dealing with those who don't. In a perfect world, anyone so eager to snuff out life would start and end their murder spree with themselves; unfortunately, nihilists tend to be more ambitious.

So what to do? As a nation, we tend to be dichotomous; we limit ourselves to yes or no, Democrat or Republican, friend or lover, Pepsi or Coke. Neither of our two most widely advocated methods of dealing with violent criminals are particularly appealing, but it looks like we're stuck with them until someone makes a creative breakthrough and provides a third option popular enough to gain public support (much the way Dr. Pepper provided an alternative for people who thought Coke was too harsh on the stomach and Pepsi too sweet). Compared to execution, prison in its ideal state — a place of confinement and reform — doesn't seem like a bad solution to me. But as everyone knows, it has been twisted and perverted from its original intent, becoming instead a kind of primitive Thunderdome, a subculture operating under its own rules. (Unless, of course, you're one of those white collar criminals who, despite often costing the taxpayers millions, do their time in cells which are not unlike rooms at the Hilton. Of course, most of these people are wealthy and white, and so, in the eyes of the American public, couldn't have done anything all that bad.) Another problem that our political system will never get around to solving before Doomsday, most likely.

But certainly state-sanctioned murder, undermined by its own hypocrisy and by the frightening implications it can lead to — think Hitler, think Stalin — is not the answer. The idea of an individual deciding who lives or dies is terrifying enough, but at least the individual's power is limited. My terror grows exponentially at the idea of an entire government wielding the power of death over millions.

Killing the killers solves nothing. It only makes us an accomplice to their crimes and, in a way, vindicates them, since we are in effect condoning their methods and adopting them for ourselves. We are saying, "Your solution to the problem is much better than anything we have come up with — thank you for teaching us how to kill and hate," and we make them martyrs for a regime of death.

Don't forget space aliens

To the Editor:

I don't know if I agree with Keith Didion's presumptuous statement, "Knowledge that doesn't come from this world can't be of any use in it." Hey Keith, have you ever once stopped and allowed yourself to be engulfed by all the marvels and wonders that space aliens have given us? If you haven't, you should. It's very practical and requires very little faith!

RAIL crazy about prisons?

To the Editor:

A letter to the Collegian (Oct. 30) stated that the publicity the Revolutionary Anti-Imperialist League created for Prison Awareness Week upset a student eating dinner. We aren't sorry that our work to defend prisoners from a corrupt "Amerikan" judicial system cost someone their appetite. That system kills people and destroys communities in a manner more cold-blooded than any murderer currently behind bars.

In "Amerika," incarceration has nothing to do with crime, but with the political, economic and military control of the Black, Latino and First Nations. The incarceration rate for black men is seven times higher than for white men. To make a global comparison, the "United Snakes" imprisons four times as many blacks per capita as the old apartheid nation in South Africa. RAIL targets prisons and the police in our organizing, because we recognize their role as key weapons in "Ametika's" war on the oppressed.

You can't argue that blacks commit more crimes, as the evidence doesn't support that. It's telling to look at drug charges, as the 58 percent of federal prisoners are in there for drugs. Blacks are 12 percent of the U.S. population, and 13 percent of monthly drug users, but they are 74 percent of the drug possession sentences given out each year. Crime has nothing to do with incarceration and the whole system is just a charade to weed out most of the whites and send the blacks and Latinos to jail.

According to a telephone poll conducted in 1996 by the UMass administration, 50 percent of students admit to using marijuana in the year prior, and 17 percent to driving while intoxicated. These are definitely considered crimes, but you don't see large numbers of students at the disproportionately white UMass heading of to jail.

There is no evidence that locking people up or killing them affects the crime rate. If what you want is a reduction in crime, then you will need to find another strategy to support. If you want to see the worst drug dealers punished, we suggest you target the CIA for bringing drugs into North America by the plane and boat loads to fund their dirty wars. If you want to stop murder, target the likes of Reagan, Bush and Clinton who have killed hundreds of thousands of people in invasions and attacks on Third World nations. If you want to stop rape, then organize against the U.S. military and it's legions of brothels that surround every U.S. military base in the Third World.

As for Jeffrey Curley, what apparently happened to this boy is a horrible and incorrect thing. But how will locking up these two men do anything to change the societal problem of child abuse and molestation?

The great majority of child abuse occurs within the home by family members, but these cases are very rarely prosecuted. What the rabid frenzy around stranger-molestation does is distract attention from the real cause of child abuse — the patriarchal family — and end up prolonging the system that says that children are property. All that going gung-ho after the very rare stranger rape cases does is tell the rest of society that when daddy rapes daughter, that's OK. By eliminating the patriarchy and the parental ownership of children we can stop all of this horrible crime against humanity.

While a great many "Amerikans" will oppose our efforts because they benefit from "Amerikan" apartheid, that does not make our cause any less correct or any less necessary. The struggle for true justice requires that we recognize that the "Amerikan" justice system is not about justice at all, but instead about maintaining an apartheid system.

In February, RAIL will be conducting a People's Tribunal to judge the "Amerikan" injustice system for the crimes of genocide and oppression. Defenders of the system are welcome and encouraged to assist the defense in this public event. We are confident that the facts can speak for themselves and in the long run the people will end the tyranny of "Amerikan" injustice.

Lucky kid says thanks

To the Editor:

I am one of the lucky kids in Peter Cookson's ("Mr. C's") classroom (5th and 6th grade) at Mark's Meadow School. I think that he is a wonderful teacher and very fun to be around. I came from a school that didn't have interns, so we didn't have the chance to see different teaching styles. Mr. C has special ways of describing fractions, decimals and other math skills. In just eight short weeks, Mr. C has responded to our weekly journals and shown lots of interest in everything we do. He appreciates anything we do as long as we try.

In the past few years we've had many hard-working UMass athletes visit our classes. Some are pros now. And sometimes we hear about drinking and drugs and other bad things that UMass students do.

I just wanted to let everybody know that we are very lucky to have Mr. Cookson and other interns from UMass. They work very hard too. Whoever gets Mr. C as a full-time teacher will be very lucky!

The other "piano man," the energetic Ben Folds, entertained an all-ages crowd at Pearl Street Wednesday.

Chapel Hill's Ben Folds Five wows Pearl Street crowd

BEN FOLDS FIVE / TRAVIS / VERBOW
Pearl Street
Nov. 5

NORTHAMPTON — When they played their first Northampton gig at the Iron Horse four years ago, there were only six people in the audience. Wednesday night at Pearl Street, a packed house witnessed an energetic show from Ben Folds Five.

Ben Folds Five, a North Carolina trio centered around the piano playing of the band's namesake, Ben Folds, has staked a claim to success with a unique sound. Without the overwhelming distraction of a lead guitar, Folds is allowed to explore distinct harmonies with the keys.

What results is a fantastic sound that effectively blends Folds' piano with Robert Sledge's bass and Darren Jessee's drums. No one instrument overwhelms another, and the guitar is never missed.

"There's a different energy behind making the music without a guitar," Folds said. "Even if you get some of the same sounds, it's a different energy. The amount of energy in a guitar chord is nothing, I don't have to go panting and resting. When I play the equivalent on the piano it's killing me."

Shortly after the start of its 17-song set, the group displayed some of the energy that has given Ben Folds Five a swift rise in popularity.

The crowd of mostly college and high school-age fans immediately recognized and cheered the second song of the night, "The Battle of Who Could Care Less," which was the first single from the band's second album.

The song, which came from Folds' tiring of the typical Generation X attitude.

"One thing I don't like is to bring something down is to bored. It's so easy and it gets you so much respect, and I'm so tired of that," he said. "It started off as more of novelty, with the battle being fought by Major Boredom and General Apathy."

"Battle" was followed by "Philosophy" from the group's self-titled debut effort. From there, the band got personal. Folds introduced an impromptu effort that harkened back to the show at the Iron Horse. Based on a simple rhythm and a few basic chords, the improvisation proved a hit.

Although many of the night's songs were selections from the latest album, Whatever and Ever, Amen, Ben Folds Five got the greatest response from the singles currently in radio circulation, "Brick" and "One Angry Dwarf and 200 Solemn Faces" among them.

The trio finished their tight, exuberant set with perhaps their most widely recognized tune, "Underground." Both Jessee and Sledge helped on the intro, which reads like a diary entry, "I was never cool in school, I'm sure you don't remember me."

The group answered the call for an encore by covering the Flaming Lips' "Vaseline," which will most likely be on their next album, along with "Song for the Dumped."

The show ended with Folds on top of his baby grand, stool in hand. After Jessee and Sledge set up the final chord, Folds dropped the stool on the keys with a crashing thud, the direct opposite of where the group's career is heading.

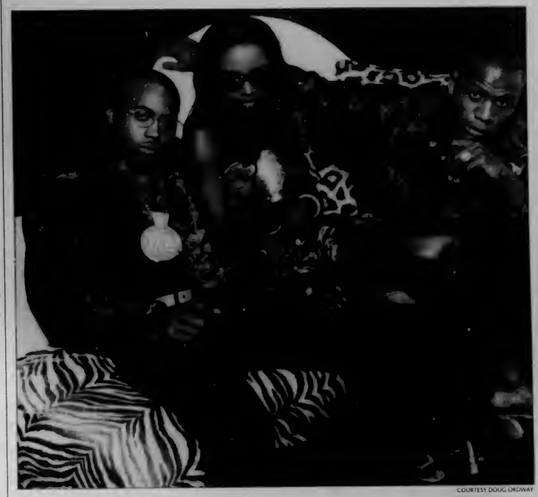
Scotland's Travis and Chicago's Verbow provided the set- up for Ben Folds Five with distinctly different sounds. The contrast of guitar and cello mixed nicely for Verbow, who suffered the fate of an audience not quite into the show. Travis' poppy British sound was received favorably through its 10-song set, though the intense guitar was almost overwhelming at points.

The Firm a bold urban musical statement

By Adam Dlugacz
Collegian Staff

THE FIRM — THE ALBUM
Nas Escobar, Foxy Brown, AZ And Nature
Aftermath/Interscope

Take four top MC's (Nas, Foxy Brown, AZ, and Nature) as your main ingredients, and then throw in a producer like Dr. Dre to hold the stew together and you have a quite a recipe.



The Firm (Aftermath/Interscope) is best seen as artists banding together to maximize their abilities with one of the best producers to show what hip-hop is truly capable of. The first track "Firm Fiasco" and the first single "Firm Biz" perfectly demonstrate what this clique can do when they are at their best. The tracks combine Nas's brilliant story telling with Foxy Brown's in your face lyrics with AZ holding his own and Dr. Dre laying down some fat beats as the glue and you have some hits. The "Firm Fiasco's" shameless copping of lines from the film Goodfellas is a hilarious introduction to this amazing album.

As you can tell the songs with title's like "Firm Family," "Executive Decision," "Untouchable," and "Desparados" they detail a world of street crime but on an upper class more organized level. Unlike Wu-Tang, who celebrate street thuggery and more common crimes, The Firm is about forming an African-American Mafioso. The realism in this album is that they are committing crime so that they can beat the game and rise to economic prominence through controlling the crime world.

Nas is clearly the best MC here, as his straight-faced depictions of a world of cars, cash, weed, and guns add a serious tone. Nas is not glorifying what he is doing, he is simply telling you what he does and what the benefits of his exploits are.

Foxy Brown also represents on "Fk Somebody Else" in which she laments over how weak men force her to turn elsewhere. It is because Perry Farrell's Jane's Addiction have returned with a new album and tour.

■ firm

Foxy flaunts her vulgarity in a way that was strictly restricted to male rappers that makes her so enjoyable. While AZ and Nature represent admirably, they simply cannot match the exploits of Nas or Foxy.

Dr. Dre is the key ingredient in this album as he holds it all together. He combines the skills of RZA and Puff Daddy with the tracks alternating between the sparse sting arrangements made famous by the RZA and the lets get the party started tracks typified by Puff Daddy's works. He restricts the funk influences to one track, but because it only appears once, this "West Coast" flavoring is a welcome change of pace.

As for the lesser know talent like Pretty Boy, Wizard and Cannabis, Cannabis is the clear winner. Coming off being the only shining aspect of the Lost Boyz album, Cannabis' go-for-the-throat verbal technique shines on an album dominated by a more slowed down pace. If Nas is the cool and collected MC, Cannabis is the MC who can't wait to grab the mike simply because he knows he can tear it up.

One negative aspect of this album is that it claims to represent street life for the average African–American. While I don't doubt that is what they are trying to push across, it is hard not to feel that most of this is a fantasy world wear men where leather jackets, gold chains, drive fast cars, carry big guns, and are cool characters. That is not something most average African–American's experience.

Also, while Foxy Brown is more than admirable as a female MC, the album tends to represent as either assets to the men's business or objects of lust. Finally, the only optimism on this album is in the form of rising to the top of the crime game, not exactly uplifting stuff.

While it is not something you haven't heard before, it is simply better then what you have heard before. The beats and verbal skills are top–notch and every song will keep your attention, as will the surprisingly hilarious interludes. There is the underlying feeling though that the members of the Firm are trying to do what the Wu–Tang dynasty has done but they lack the dynamics. Either way this is an album that is sure to feature many top singles and to be heard from many a passing vehicle. A–

Jane's Addiction suffers 'relapse'

KETTLE WHISTLE
Jane's Addiction
Warner Bros.

Jane's Addiction, for better or worse, are one of a select handful of bands that helped to shape alternative music into what it is today. They headlined the very first Lollapalooza way back in 1991 as their intended swan song.

They've returned, or "relapsed" as Perry Farrell put it, and the original lineup — with RHCP's Flea standing in on bass for Eric Avery — have released a new album as well as embarked on a concert tour which hits Waltham's Gosman Center tonight (check out the Collegian for a review on Monday).

Kettle Whistle (Warner Bros.) was originally scheduled for release in mid–October but was delayed while a new song, "So What!," was recorded. Originally written back during their heyday, it was never finished, and, consequently, has never been heard — that is until now.

The title track, which is the other new song here, is a lengthy (mostly–instrumental) dirge that is in a similar vein as the prog–rock favored by King Crimson. The remainder of the tracks are rare, previously unreleased, live recordings and demos.

The live tracks, among them their biggest hit "Jane Says" and "Stop," are mostly standard fare. They were chosen because of their "vibe and attitude" according to drummer Stephen Perkins, which means that sound quality was often sacrificed for musical performance; something which is quite evident, and a welcome change. But it's the unreleased songs that will no doubt be of greatest interest to long time fans.

The psychedelic "Slow Divers," "My Cat's Name Is Maceo," and "City" are each fine songs in their own right, but it's the Nothing's Shocking outtake "Had A Dad" that stands out above all else. It was originally intended for the album but was rejected by Warner Bros. Go figure.

While not earth–shattering, Kettle Whistle is still a fine relapse. B+ (Marty Keane)

FILLMORE EAST: 2–11–69
The Grateful Dead
Grateful Dead/Arista

The latest in the continuing line of live archival releases of the music of the band that for 30 years defined the life of a rock band on the road, while taking on just about every musical genre in America, is a broiling representation of the band near the end of the '60s, the end of the band's true "psychedelia" period, and the end of the band's opening–act role in music at the time.

Trax On Trax Off

Indeed, the new set features the band's two opening sets for a double–header Janis Joplin show. Rarely played live songs like their rather rough, rusty "Hey Jude" cover, the beautifully laid out acoustic–based "Mountains Of The Moon," and the bouncy "Doin' That Rag," mostly all of which disappeared from the band's repertoire after '69, show up on the 2–disc set.

However, the listener also gets one of the most powerful versions of "The Eleven," a rather short (12:29) version of the jam–showcase "Dark Star," as well as other strong points in "Cryptical Envelopment/The Other One" and "Caution," preceded by a short drum solo by Mickey Hart & Billy Kreutzmann. It is a good set to buy, even if you already own Live/Dead, which was recorded only 16 days later than this new product, but released in '69. B+ (Joshua Boyd)

MARCY PLAYGROUND
Marcy Playground
EMI/Capitol

From just a glance at the song titles on their self–titled EMI/Capitol debut album, Marcy Playground make it clear that this record is aiming to set itself apart from the mainstream "alternative" bandwagon. Titles such as "Sex and Candy" and "The Vampires of New York" are striking at first glance, and arouses curiosity around giving this disc a listen.

Already making a name for themselves by opening for Toad the Wet Sprocket and Everclear, Marcy Playground craft a distinct musical style all their own. Not quite soft, mellow rock and not quite hard, driving agresiveness, Marcy Playground's songs offer a steady rhythm, a few catchy hooks, and a lot of twisted fun. Not bad for a band who got their name from an elementary school recess yard.

Lead vocalist/songwriter John Wozniak's talent lies in his amusing, and at the same time disturbing lyrics. Songs like "Saint Joe on the School Bus" and "One More Suicide" demonstrate the band's dual nature. With Wozniak also on guitar, Marcy Playground is rounded out by Dylan Keefe on bass, and Dan Reiser on drums.

With their first single, "Sex and Candy," receiving minimal airplay, Marcy Playground achieves all the qualities of an underrated band. Other songs that show promise on the album, "Poppies" and "Sherry Frasier," are more than likely to remain obscure.

Receiving some much deserved recognition, Marcy Playground's first release is a strong, if not flawless debut. For those interested in something different, it might be something you want to check out. A– (Kevin Monahan)

V–ball has tough stretch ahead

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

This is the moment of truth — right here, right now. The Massachusetts volleyball team can control its own destiny. In order to succeed, the team that coach Bonnie Kenny calls, "the team that has as much chemistry as any other team I've coached," needs to circle the wagons and prepare for an a tough stretch run.

After Saturday's defeat of St. Bonaventure, Kenny said "we'll just have to hope that we get a few breaks along the way."

That's exactly what happened. Going into last weekend, the Minutewomen found themselves a full game behind the Virginia Tech Hokies for the fourth and final playoff spot in the A–10 championship race.

After splitting the weekend, UMass got help from some of their Atlantic 10 foes. As they come down the stretch and into a crucial four–match set on the road, the Minutewomen are now amidst a three–way tie for fourth.

That was until last night.

Their first of four opponents was Rhode Island, which has already clinched the right to play over Thanksgiving. Last night, UMass went into Rhode Island knowing that it needed to produce. Produce, the Minutewomen did not.

URI controlled the match throughout, taking it in four sets, 15–3, 15–8, 10–15, 15–11. The Minutewomen (12–14, 7–8 in the A–10) used Rams hitting errors to make it somewhat interesting, but for the most part, URI had it in its pocket from the first serve.

Volleyball
Massachusetts @ Virginia Tech
Saturday

It looked like a poor man's Penn State rout after the first two games. UMass was not clicking in its passing and blocking, while URI looked like a team fighting to hold onto second place in the conference, which the Rams were. Game one saw the Rams hit an astronomical .591 from the field, compared to the Minutewomen's .056 average.

After an error–littered game three for the Rams, the two teams battled and battled, matching each other kill for kill. But after the dust settled, it was URI who came out on top.

Sophomore middle blocker Jill Meyers had yet another solid performance, picking up a double–double with 12 digs and 11 kills (.321) to go along with three blocks. Sophomore outside hitter Sarah Watters collected a team– high 12 kills for the Minutewomen, who dropped their second match to the defending Atlantic 10 champs this year. Freshman Rebecca Hasson had a personal moment, registering a career–high six block assists.

The Minutewoman blocking game excelled against a very strong Ram attack. They outblocked the Rams 19–13, a feat that not many teams have equalled. To add to that, the Rams were the ones committing the hitting errors, outdoing the Minutewomen, 29–19. It was just a case of the Rams getting more chances to put the point away.

With the loss, the Minutewomen need to put things in focus. With a match coming up on Saturday, UMass needs to put together a string of a few wins, something that has been hard to come by in the dog days of October and November. Not only that, the Minutewomen take on three more playoff contenders, all fighting for their respective lives.

Saturday's match takes place in Blacksburg, Va., where UMass is set to take on the Hokies. Earlier in the year, Virginia Tech came into Amherst and manhandled the Minutewomen, catching them off–guard. But they're on a bit of a slide, losing their last two contests in conference. Match time is set for 7 p.m. at Cassell Coliseum.

But after breaking their three–year run as conference champs last year with a 3–2 loss to Dayton in the final, UMass knows they can only continue what has been their approach all year, one game at a time.

After all, they will once again be facing No. 4 seed Dayton (8–3–0; 16–3 overall) for the second straight year in tournament play today in the first semi–final game at 5:30 p.m.

The second semi–final game will be between No. 2 seed George Washington and No. 3 seed Xavier at 8 p.m. tomorrow. The winners will duel for the championship on Sunday at 1 p.m.

After this past weekend's two tough losses at the University of Georgia Tournament against No. 17 Clemson, 4–3 and Georgia, 1–0, this weekend is crucial for the Minutewomen because the winner of Sunday's championship game receives an automatic berth to the NCAA tournament.

Dayton, despite playing a fairly weak schedule in which their only three losses were to A–10 teams, still gave UMass a scare during the regular season, though UMass prevailed 2–1 in overtime thanks to two Emma Kurowksi goals.

The Flyers are led by a powerful trio up front, as well with Melissa Buck, Julie Wilde and Angie Beecroft all leading the team with 21 points apiece. Dayton has eight players of their own who have scored in double figures. The goalkeeping duties have been split between Amy Kremmer and Damian Gold whom together have posted a .815 goals against average.

The quality of competition behind the two squads is a major difference. While the Minutewomen have struggled all season with injuries and sickness and plenty of top–notch tournament hopping, they have still maintained a national ranking, amidst a schedule that included four ranked teams, against which UMass came out 2–2. Dayton has played a less rigorous schedule, including the likes of Detroit Mercy, Wright State and Eastern Illinois.

The key for Massachusetts is how they start off the first half. In recent games when UMass has come out flat, they either lose or win in overtime like they did over Dayton and Xavier — both 2–1 nailbiters won in the second half.

Another advantage the Minutewomen have over the Flyers is their offense–producing defense. Senior tri–captain fullback Erica Iverson is the fourth leading scorer on the team with 7 goals and 2 assists for 16 points, along with consistent contributors Amy Burrill (7 points), Liz Rutherford (5 points) and sweeper Amanda Thompson (4 points).

The recent return — from injury — of junior Robin Smith also adds a major boost in controlling the midfield play and providing a scoring punch with 3 goals and 6 assists for 12 points. While UMass has been forced to rotate players between positions, the mainstay in goal has been tri– captain Danielle Dion who owns a .861 goals against average.

Massachusetts has been reaping the benefits of the influx of freshman Green, the team's leading point–getter (36). Kate Webb (6 goals, 5 assists) for 15 points and the aggressive midfield play of Brooke Bartlett (2 goals and 7 assists) for 11 points.

This weekend will be the second meeting of the return of former UMass standout and all–time leading scorer Rebecca Myers, now an assistant for the Flyers.

an otherwise spotless league record. UMass' game against the Golden Rams was on grass, a surface the Minutewomen have played on only once since moving to Garber Field this year.

The Minutewomen face Temple in a rematch of a Sept. 28 tilt in Amherst. A 2–1 overtime UMass win, proved to be a battle. After the Owls scored an early goal, neither team's defensive corps would back down and the Minutewomen did not find the net with the tying goal until 1:35 left in regulation. That set the stage for Kerry Lyons' heroic efforts, as she tallied the game–winning goal, the first of two sudden–deathers for her this season.

"One thing we took from that game was the knowledge that it's never over until it's over," UMass coach Patty Shea said. "We need to take care of the first 10 minutes of the game. That was where the problem with Temple was the last time, they scored early."

However, when the two teams last did battle, the season was only nine games old. Since then, over a month of work has changed the squads.

"Temple is going to be ready," Shea said. "Both teams have grown since we last played. Each one has found what does and doesn't work. It might not be what worked the last time we played."

The tournament's top seed, West Chester has had a remarkable turnaround year. After a 0–5–0 campaign in the Golden Rams' first season in the A–10, they have this year put together an undefeated league mark.

"West Chester is an experienced team," Shea said. "They have turned that experience, with a lot of juniors and seniors, into a strong season."

West Chester will face La Salle, a team which visited Garber Field on Oct. 18. The Explorers fell victim to the Minutewomen, 6–1, in their last trip to Amherst.

An argument could be made that the tournament will not lack scoring, a case reinforced by the fact that the league's top three scorers — and 16–of–18 on the A–10 scoring chart — will be in Amherst this weekend.

But an equally strong contention could be made for a lack of scoring. Of the conference's top five goalies, four — including one back–up — will be in uniform this weekend.

Erica Johnston's five Atlantic 10 goals (18 overall) have her sitting atop the scoring chart, where she is backed up by teammate Vicky Browne. Browne, a midfielder has seven goals and 12 assists on the season, three and two in the A– 10, respectively.

But it is West Chester which packs the most in–conference offensive firepower. Four of the league's top seven scorers are Golden Rams: Mary Melnick (7 goals–6 assists–20 points overall), Jen Krebs (6–3–15), Kristin Smereczynski (6–8–20) and Donna Polito (4–0–8).

Temple has seen a rise in goal production in non– conference games. As a result, the Owls' Claudia Ovchinnikoff (10–2–22) and Cherifa Nouri (9–3–21) hold the third and fourth positions on the overall list.

The Explorers are bolstered by Alishia Faller (5–3–13), Colleen Bruno (5–2–12) and Kelly Saxman (5–4–10).

Goaltending is definite strength in this year tourney, as the highest goals against average sits at 2.11. Heather Vearling leads the pack with a .890 save percentage. UMass' Zowie Tucker has a 1.00 goals against average through the last eight games of the regular season, and Deb Brown has made 174 saves on the year.

UM Hockey takes on Mavericks

Minutemen welcome new program to the show

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

The members of the Massachusetts hockey team are experts at newly instated programs, and in their fifth year as a Division 1 program, they will face a team this weekend in its inaugural season.

Hockey
Massachusetts @ Nebraska-Omaha
Tonight, 7 p.m.

The Minutemen will be looking to give Nebraska–Omaha a harsh welcome to Div. 1 play this weekend, when they to Omaha for a two–game set.

UMass (0–5, 0–3 in Hockey East) have had themselves a not–so welcome start to the season. Their three losses have exposed a weakness the team needs to address immediately.

Senior co–captain Tim Lovell leads the team in scoring with three goals and three assists, and he has already factored into six of the seven Minutemen goals this season. Along with his No. 1 line cohorts, junior Steve MacKinnon and sophomore Jeff Blanchard, the threesome has been the UMass offense this season.

It was not until the team's 3–1 loss to Boston College last Sunday afternoon in their home opener that any other Minuteman line factored into a goal scored, with that being senior co–captain Brad Norton's power play goal at the 1:54 mark of the third period.

Against a newly instated program in Nebraska–Omaha, UMass should be able to find enough space to work their other lines onto the scoring sheet.

They will need to do that, because next weekend they return to Hockey East action against UMass–Lowell at home Friday (7 p.m.), and will then travel to Schenectady, N.Y. to take on All–American goaltender Trevor Koenig and Union on Saturday night.

For UMass coach Joe Mallen, it has not been for the lack of effort that his team has not evenly distributed their scoring, and this weekend might not be the kindest of places to restart their offensive punch.

"We've certainly been trying to get more people into the mix, but its just been a few mistakes here and there that have hurt us so far," Mallen said. "These two games are certainly not gimme's, and what is different from our program is that Nebraska has had a year to recruit players.

"They have a good lineup filled with transfers, USHL players and Canadian junior players who have sat out a year to play. But, if we play our system, and execute, we should be in good shape," Mallen said.

Another difference the Minutemen have with the Mavericks is the level of support the newer program has received from their fan base.

Omaha Civic Auditorium has its 8,219–seat complex sold out through the season, and including standing room only tickets, UMass might be facing consecutive crowds of over 9,000 this weekend.

"It is a huge difference from what our program receives," Mallen said. "They are a loud and obnoxious crowd, and last weekend, they played well against Princeton out there, which is a real good team."

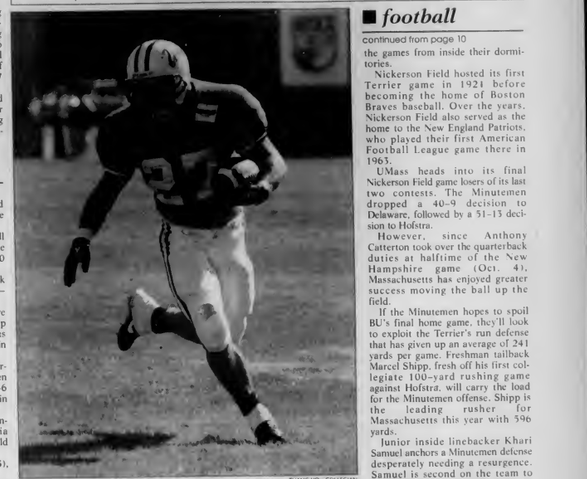
Eastern seed during the CWPA Northern Division playoff. The 10–3 defeat was UMass's second–worst of the year — and their worst against an Eastern opponent.

The flat effort was due, at least in part, to fatigue. The October 26 match was the capper of an eight–game stretch over two weekends, which also included a five game west coast trip. Of the eight teams UMass –played, only Boston College was unranked. Between the harsh travel schedule and the relentless string of top 25 competition, no one could blame the Minutemen for being a bit tired. Queens, incidentally, was idle the previous weekend.

Fatigue was not the only enemy, of course.



"Our defense was terrible," UMass coach Russ Yarworth said. "But you can't play your best game all the time."

The Royals' defense was smothering, completely shutting down junior standout Brian Stahl. Stahl, who continues to pace the Minutemen with 79 goals (eight 2–pointers) on the season (including 11 in the previous two games), was held scoreless.

Again, the Minutemen will attempt to repeat history. Queens has ousted them from the Northerns each of the last two years. Both times, UMass has come back to beat them for the Eastern title.

Yarworth is optimistic about this year's rematch, promising that his squad will be better prepared for the Royals' defense.

"The Queens coach has basically shown me his whole game plan," Yarworth said. "I'm not the smartest guy in the world, but I've got a lot of videotape... there's not much else they can do. We can analyze [the Royals], break them down, and come back with a different attack."

the games from inside their dormitories.

Nickerson Field hosted its first Terrier game in 1921 before becoming the home of Boston Braves baseball. Over the years, Nickerson Field also served as the home to the New England Patriots, who played their first American Football League game there in 1963.

UMass heads into its final Nickerson Field game losers of its last two contests. The Minutemen dropped a 40–9 decision to Delaware, followed by a 51–13 decision to Hofstra.

However, since Anthony Catterton took over the quarterback duties at halftime of the New Hampshire game (Oct. 4), Massachusetts has enjoyed greater success moving the ball up the field.

If the Minutemen hopes to spoil BU's final home game, they'll look to exploit the Terrier's run defense that has given up an average of 241 yards per game. Freshman tailback Marcel Shipp, fresh off his first collegiate 100–yard rushing game against Hofstra, will carry the load for the Minutemen offense. Shipp is the leading rusher for Massachusetts this year with 596 yards.

Junior inside linebacker Khari Samuel anchors a Minutemen defense desperately needing a resurgence. Samuel is second on the team to Bryan Mooney for the lead in tackles with 102.

flanked on one side by fifth–year senior Tyrone Weeks. Weeks has returned under a new NCAA rule granting Prop 48 players a fourth year of eligibility if they graduate on time, and take graduate classes in their fifth year.

Weeks and Ketner provide a low–post presence that will be difficult for any team in the country to match.

Their presence, and the experience of the sophomore class will take pressure off the four new Minutemen, joining Mack as newcomers this year are: fellow South Boston alum, Jonathan DePina (5–foot–9 guard), Rafael Cruz (6–5 guard) and Ronell Blizzard (6–9 forward).

Junior walk–ons Andy Maclay and Ross Burns round out Flint's squad that will try top last year's 19–14 NCAA tournament team.

Sox deal Aaron Sele for Leyritz and Buford

By Fred Hurlbrink, Jr.
Collegian Staff

Last night, the Red Sox took a giant step towards their goal of building a pennant contender — they got rid of Aaron Sele.

Sele — along with relief pitcher Mark Brandenburg and backup catcher Bill Haselman — was traded to the pitching starved Texas Rangers for veteran catcher/first baseman Jim Leyritz and utility outfielder Damon Buford.

Sele came up quickly through the Red Sox farm system and burst onto the scene in 1993 with a 7–2 record and a 2.74 ERA. Since then, though, his once promising career has been in a tailspin. He spent most of 1995 on the disabled list with a shoulder injury, and in the last two seasons the curveballer has gone 20–23 with an ERA well over 5.00.

Leyritz, who was traded by the Angels to the Rangers in mid–season for Ken Hill, was expendable after Texas reached a contract agreement with superstar catcher Ivan Rodriguez. The former Yankee can play first base as well as catch, and earlier in his career filled in at second and third base.

Unless Red Sox GM Dan Duquette trades embattled All Star Mo Vaughn, Leyritz will take over behind the plate for the Sox with either Jason Varitek or Scott Hatteberg backing him up.

Last season, split between Anaheim and Texas, Leyritz hit .277 with 11 homers and a career–high 64 RBI. He had his best offensive season in 1993 with the Yankees when he hit .304 with 14 homers 53 RBI.

The Red Sox will be Buford's fourth team in six years. The career .232 hitter started with Baltimore and spent half a season with the Mets before landing in Texas and now Boston.

A career back–up, Haselman began his career in Texas before playing in Seattle and Boston. His best season came in '96 for the Red Sox: he hit .274 with 8 home runs and 34 RBI.

Brandenburg was shipped back to the Rangers after being dealt from Texas for Mike Stanton. In 41 games last season, he had a 5.49.

Club — The UMass Amateur Radio Club Station W1PUO is returning and looking for people to join in Ham radio. Anyone interested in radio/electronics and a desire to learn and communicate with others around the world is welcome. The club will sponsor FCC approved volunteer examination sessions for all license levels. For more information, contact Richard Szrycharz N1MFT at 549-6000 ext. 6000 or leave a message at facility services.

Contest — Spectrum Fine Art and Literary Magazine is now holding a cover contest. The winner will have their artwork printed on the 97/98 issue. The final deadline is December 2 at 5 p.m. Pick up an entry form in the Student Union, room 806e or just bring the artwork by.

Deadline — The deadline for applying for the Student Deputy Attorney General position is Friday, Nov. 7. Applications are available at the Student Government Office in the Student Union. For more information, contact Jesse Burchfield at 545-5411.

Final Exam Schedule — The Fall '97 Final Examination Schedule will be available beginning Friday, October 17. Copies will be delivered to students in the residence halls, and will be available to off-campus students in the Registrar's office (215 Whitmore). It will also be available on the World Wide Web beginning Wednesday, October 1 at http://www-unix.umass.edu.

Food Drive — The UMass NSSLHA chapter along with Amherst Survival Center are sponsoring a food drive in honor of hunger awareness month. Bring non-perishable food to Arnold House, School of Public Health throughout November.

Notice — The women's basketball team is looking for managers for the upcoming season. Reliability and a significant time commitment are required. If interested, please call Scott Foulis at 545-2726.

Notice — Spring semester intramural basketball terms are being accepted from Nov. 6-Nov. 19 in Boyden, room 215.

FYIs are public service announcements printed daily. To submit an FYI, please send a press release containing all pertinent information, including the name and phone number of the contact person to the Collegian, c/o the Managing Editor by noon the previous day.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You may need a little unorthodox assistance today, and you mustn't be afraid to ask for it in a timely and straightforward manner.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — Teamwork is key today, but you must choose your partners with great care. Little can come of an alliance with strangers today.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — Business affairs may demand your complete attention throughout much of the day. Reserve evening hours for family business.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — Concentrate on one thing at a time today. Do what you can to help someone in need. See if you can't come up with a new way to do something.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — Your focus must be on practical matters today. One slip–up may result in a slowdown that threatens your present endeavor.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — Take care that your energy doesn't become frenetic and unfocused today. Self– discipline is the only way you can achieve your goals.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — It is all right to have help today, provided you're willing to give credit where credit is due. Do not try to steal someone else's thunder!

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — You can get more done today than you had expected. Later, you'll want to revise your schedule for the next few days to accommodate a dream.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — A romantic adventure may be in store for you and a loved one. A recent gamble is likely to pay off at this time. Do what you can to get a smile.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You are going to have to check and double–check all calculations today. As you get down to the wire, you must minimize any possibility of error.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — Tread softly today when you find that others are reacting to you in a way that seems out of proportion to your behavior. Make adjustments smoothly.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — You will receive news from afar today that has you reacting instinctively. Do not let your feelings get the better of you, however.

Whalers only failures financially

JOBMA KANJANEN / COLLEGIAN

Kate Putnam and the Minutewomen look to take home the A–10 trophy on their own field.

Around the Horn

How 'bout those Whalers! (Oops, I mean Hurricanes.)

Sure, they may be doing as well in Carolina as they did in Hartford, but they did upend the Stanley Cup champion Red Wings on Wednesday night.

Now let's put aside all the gripe about Peter Karmanos moving the Failures to the luxurious Greensboro Coliseum. I don't know why it seems like everyone here in the sports department is rooting against them. They were Connecticut's team, and the only reason why you can't relate is because most of you are from Massachusetts (or even worse, New York).

So, I tell you: just go sit in your corner and root for the Bruins or the Rangers. (If you like the Islanders I respect you, so don't worry.)

Let me tell you what it's been like to be a Whalers fan for the first 18 years of my life.

The memories started around age seven, when I made my first trip to the Hartford Civic Center (which, by the way, is the only place in North America where you can go shopping in a mall and watch a hockey game without leaving the building.) The Whalers were actually good then, and I remember waiting outside with my dad to get tickets. They routed the Blackhawks 11–4 that night, led by the strong goaltending of Steve Weeks.

Things only got better in that dream 1986–'87 season. The Whalers — led by Mike Liut, Dean Evason and Ron Francis — won the Adams Division title before eventually falling in the Adams Division finals.

Hartford continued its winning ways over the next few years, seemingly always making the playoffs, but never making it out of the divisional finals.

Then, in the '91–'92 season, the demise of the Whalers began. All that you need to know is the mega-mistake that was made by the Hartford hierarchy, which traded team captain and fan favorite Ron Francis to Pittsburgh for John Cullen and a couple of hacks. Cullen never panned out in the Insurance City, and well, we all know what Francis has accomplished in Pittsburgh.

As the talent diminished on the ice, so did the support from the fans and the ownership. The team was sold to Karmanos, and the team was now referred to more as The Failures than as the Whalers. Ticket prices went sky high, and there was a constant effort by Karmanos to sell all of the skyboxes in the Civic Center. Hockey just wasn't the same in Hartford.

The fans didn't recognize the names anymore. There was no Francis, no Evason, and no Liut anymore. In their place were a bunch of young unknowns with names like Pronger, Daniels, and Poulin. In fact, the only two who survived through the whole ordeal were Geoff Sanderson and Sean Burke. And even those two couldn't guarantee that the team would be a playoff contender.

In the end, even after a last–minute push by the state of Connecticut, the Whalers jumped ship and headed south to the Carolinas. But even though Karmanos can take the team away from the fans, he can never take away the memories.

He can't take away the bond which a father and his son share as they make the trip up Interstate–91 a handful of times every year.

He can't take away the memories that a bunch of friends share as they buy a drunken Elvis impersonator a beer during a game. (Yes, my friends and I did that one night while the Whale was loning to St. Louis.)

He can't erase the painted–up guy in the Whalers jersey who always used to hold a sign that read, "I Bleed Green."

And so, while some Whalers fans will stick by their team even as they have moved 1,000 miles away, others will change their affiliation to another NHL team. But don't lose any sleep over it, because Peter Karmanos isn't. He's content in North Carolina where his pockets are filled with money.

So while all of you Bruins and Rangers fans are sitting there in the FleetCenter or in MSG just remember what I feel like without a hockey team. There will be no trips up I–91 this year for me. I have to go to New Haven instead and watch American Hockey League action. (Which, by the way, was more exciting than watching the Whalers play sometimes.)

But don't have pity for me because I really don't care what you think. After all, no matter where they move to, I will always bleed green, too.

The AstroTurf at Richard F. Garber Field will get its first taste of post–season action this weekend, when the University of Massachusetts hosts the Atlantic 10 field hockey tournament.

The four–team tournament will begin with a pair of Saturday semi–finals and conclude with a Sunday championship match. No. 1 seed West Chester will take on fourth–seeded La Salle in the first semi–final (12 p.m.) and No. 2 seed UMass will take on No. 3 Temple at 2 p.m.

Minutewomen take on Flyers in A–10 tourney

By Kathleen Ralls
Collegian Staff

One might think that returning as the top seed for this weekend's Atlantic 10 tournament in Cincinnati would make the No. 15 Massachusetts women's soccer team happy.

One might think that after going 11–0 this year in conference play (15–4 overall), the Minutewomen would be brimming with the utmost confidence.

One also might think that UMass was eating confidence for breakfast knowing for the first time in Massachusetts history three players — Kara Green (36), Emma Kurowski (35), and Sophie Lecot (30) — have scored 30 or more points in the same season and that eight Minutewomen have notched more than 10 points this season.

Minutemen tip-off at Mullins

Converse All-Stars provide exhibition opposition for Flint

By Fred Hurlbrink, Jr.
Collegian Staff

It's officially time to get the rumor mill churning, begin ridiculous speculation and start up the hype machine.

Midnight Madness has come and gone, and now the Massachusetts men's basketball team will take to the hardwood against the Converse All–Stars in an exhibition game tonight at the William D. Mullins Center. Game time is scheduled for 7 p.m.

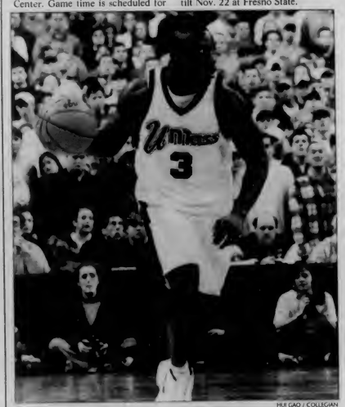
This is the first of a pair of home exhibitions for the Minutemen — they play Marathon Basketball Nov. 15 — as they continue preparation for their first regular season tilt Nov. 22 at Fresno State.

Men's Basketball
Massachusetts vs. Converse All-Stars
Tonight, 7 p.m.

The exhibitions will provide second–year UMass coach Bruiser Flint with the opportunity to see how quickly his young team can gel.

According to Flint, this group has been much easier to coach than last year's squad. He credits incredible team chemistry and an intense willingness to "do what it takes to get the job done."

Also facilitating Flint's job in the early going is the knowledge that, unlike last year, he need not count on his newcomers to produce immediately.



With Prop 48 sophomore Lari Ketner and four eligible freshmen on the squad in '96–'97, Flint had no choice but to throw his youngsters into the fire. Ketner started at center for most of the season; and now–sophomores Mike Babul, Winston Smith, Ajmal Basit and Chris Kirkland each were in the starting lineup at least once.

All but Kirkland saw consistent, significant playing time.

Monty Mack was a key member of that recruiting class, but sat out last season as a Prop 16 partial qualifier. He was able to practice with the squad, and will most likely join junior Charlton Clarke in this year's starting backcourt.

Flint, however, has refused to name a starting lineup this early, but has said that some players have surprised in practice so far — he credits improved conditioning for the improvement of many of his players.

Ketner, regarded as one of the top collegiate centers in the country, will be the man in the middle,

UMass water polo looking for history

By Jim Eltringham
Collegian Staff

The No. 10 Massachusetts men's water polo team will put their entire season on the line in Annapolis, Md. this weekend. Just three wins in the Collegiate Water Polo Association's Eastern Championships will give the 21–8 (7–2 CWPA) Minutemen an unprecedented fifth straight title and an appearance in the NCAA tournament. Just one loss, though, will send them home to wonder about what might of been.

Third–seeded UMass will begin the tournament with an afternoon showdown against Slippery Rock tomorrow. Barring any major upsets, a first–round victory would put the Minutemen in the semifinals against No. 12 Navy and possibly set up a dogfight with No. 17 Queens College for the title.

The probable road to the championship is a familiar one. In last year's Eastern tournament, UMass downed Slippery Rock 9–7 in the opener, then went on to sink Navy 10–5 in the semis and edge Queens, 10–8, in the final. It is a different season, though, and the Minutemen will not be able to sit back and hope history repeats itself.

Men's Water Polo
Eastern Championships
Saturday and Sunday

Slippery Rock is a dangerous opponent, as they head into this weekend riding a wave of momentum. Their last match was an upset victory over No. 16 George Washington. Earlier this year, the Minutemen beat then–No. 19 Slippery Rock 9–4 in the only '97 meeting between the two teams.

Navy may provide the biggest challenge of the tournament. In the all–time series, the Minutemen are just 5– 10 against the Midshipmen — but recent postseasons have been another story altogether. In each of the last four years, UMass has downed Navy on its way to the title. The current Minutemen squad is the only one to score a regular season victory over the Midshipmen, a 16–8 drubbing back in September.

A semifinal win will — most likely — pit UMass against first–seeded Queens in the finals. Two weeks ago, the Royals knocked the Minutemen out of contention for the No. 1

UM bids adieu to football at BU

By Corey Peter Goodman
Collegian Staff

For 41 years, the Boston University Terriers have found a home in the University of Massachusetts football team's fall schedule.

Spanning five decades, the intrastate rivalry has served as the Commonwealth's college football version of East versus West. UMass leads the series over that span, 25–16, not forgetting a handful of classic nail–biters as the two schools have grown together into (until recently) respectable Division I–AA programs.

But Saturday, this all comes to an end. When UMass (2–7, 1–5 Atlantic 10) travels to Nickerson Field to battle the Terriers (0–8, 0–6 A–10), at 1 p.m. The contest, which appears on the surface to be only a battle between two A–10 cellar–dwellers, will also become a farewell game for those associated with the Terrier program.

As a result of NCAA Title IX pressures to address the needs of women's athletics at BU, the football program — which loses almost $3 million each year — was suddenly dropped two weeks ago. The announcement came immediately following BU's 28–7 loss to Northeastern on Oct. 25.

The dropping of its program comes while BU closes in on its worst season ever. In fact, the Terriers haven't won a game since Oct. 19 of last year, when they squeaked out a win against Hofstra for their season's lone victory. Still, the news was shocking.

In addition, the loss of BU football means no more games at historic Nickerson Field. Home to BU football for nearly 45 years, Nickerson Field is revered for its intimate setting within the BU campus. Its location allows for some students to view

Hurricane Pauline batters Mexico

MEXICO CITY — Pacific Coast villages still recovering from a deadly battering by Hurricane Pauline were hit yesterday by waves and winds from newly formed Hurricane Rick, which was fast bearing down on the coast.

Mexico's Interior Ministry declared an emergency along the coast of Oaxaca and major ports closed ahead of the hurricane's arrival. Some residents of low–lying areas were evacuated to shelters. A hurricane warning was in effect from Acapulco southeastward to Huatulco.

Waves were rising and winds were picking up by midday yesterday, and the hurricane, with sustained winds near 85 mph, was predicted to strike by evening.

At 4 p.m. EST, Rick's eye was located about 70 miles west of the tourist resort of Puerto Escondido in Oaxaca state, and it was moving to the east–northeast at about 13 mph, according to the U.S. Hurricane Center in Miami.

ORLANDO, Fla. (AP) — A woman found a live newborn girl in the toilet of a Walt Disney World restroom with the baby's head sticking out of the water and the umbilical cord wrapped around her neck.

The 7–pound baby was hospitalized in good condition yesterday, one day after being discovered Saturday night in the Magic Kingdom. No one came forward to claim the infant.

The baby, apparently full–term, had a body temperature of 91 degrees when she was brought in by emergency care workers, said Martha Johnson, a spokeswoman for Arnold Palmer Hospital for Children and Women.

"We put the baby in a warmer for about two hours to bring her temperature and her pulse rate up," she said. "All her vital signs are good now, and she is drinking formula.

"She is very cute. She has a full head of black hair," she said.

Johnson said the baby was found apparently minutes after being born. A doctor in the park administered cardiopulmonary resuscitation to the child until emergency workers arrived. Sheriff's spokesman Miguel Pagan said investigators might not find the mother unless she seeks medical attention.

Nurses at the hospital are calling the infant the Tomorrowland baby, for the section of the Magic Kingdom she was born in.

Academic advisors work together to best help all UMass students

By Leigh Faulkner
Collegian Staff

As a result of recommendations made at the Advising Conference last January, academic advisors across the University of Massachusetts campus met on Friday to discuss ways of helping students in personal crisis.

The symposium entitled, "When Academic Advising Becomes Personal: Skillful Referrals for Students in Crisis," featured speakers, informative presentations and written materials, and the opportunity for advisors to become acquainted with many University employees who give personal guidance and advising to undergraduates on campus.

Presenters at the symposium spoke on many crisis areas in a student's life, including discussions on suicide and depression, family issues, learning, physical and psychological disabilities.

Ken Brown, academic advisor in the Arts and Sciences Center, discussed the potential advising pool.

According to the 1997 enrollment fact sheet, there are 18,000 undergraduates enrolled at the University of Massachusetts; 4,066 are first–year students, 2,500 are students of color, 1,400 are honors students and 4,700 are out–of–state students, including international students.

In addition to these numbers, many students are undeclared or pre–majors and others are declared in one of the University's 90 majors in 10 different schools and colleges. Many students also have more than one major.

Since students often belong to more than one group on campus, students may have the need for more than one advisor.

"Often from a student's perspective, he or she sees more than one professor for advising," Brown said. "We represent an entire network of advising for students."

"Students that are coming in to see us are having personal problems that are effecting their academics," Assistant Dean of Students Eileen Stewart said.

Both Stewart and Brown discussed the impact that financial situations have on students.

"We are living in an appalling materialistic world and money is on everyone's mind," Stewart said.

Stewart said students at the University have over $120 million in financial aid and a majority of that money is in loans.

"When student come in to withdraw from a course because of financial problems, it's because their debts are mounting and they have to assume more work hours, and more work hours means they need to drop a course because they can't keep up," Brown said.

As discussions started to focus on why students come in for advising, Karen Lederer from the women studies department said, "We see students who come in because of anxiety about academics. But often that anxiety is misplaced, it's coming from somewhere else. We need to attend to the big thing first."

"Many people are afraid that if you ask a student about suicide, it might make him or her commit suicide. That is not true. Someone is not going to kill themself because you asked. We, as advisors, have to ask the right questions,"
- Rockland-Miller

Mental Health clinical psychologist Linda Scott listed symptoms that are warning signs a situation in a student's life may be more problematic.

Some of these signs are if a student looks different than usual, handing in papers that make no sense, procrastination, lethargy, arriving late to class or leaving early, anger, crying or verbal or physical threats in class.

In addition to Scott, Harry Rockland–Miller, director of Mental Health, addressed the issue of how to help a student who may be suicidal or depressed.

"Many people are afraid that if you ask a student about suicide, it might make him or her commit suicide. That is not true. Someone is not going to kill themself because you asked. We, as advisors, have to ask the right questions," Rockland–Miller said.

"We see a lot of students in crisis, their coping mechanisms are not working. Students in crisis need support," Scott said.

Judy Davis, family psychotherapist at Counseling and Assessment Services lectured on the importance of families but also how burdensome they can be to college students.

College is "a space where old ways are dying and new ways have not yet been born," Davis said.

Many students leave home for the first time and they are trying to learn how to let go and stay connected at the same time, Davis said.

"One end of the spectrum students call home everyday, go home every weekend, there is no independent

Conference examines status of subcontinent in economics, politics

By Seema Gangatirkar
Collegian Staff

In 1947, the British government withdrew from the Indian subcontinent, after partitioning the country into two new nations — India and Pakistan. Later, East Pakistan would break off to form its own government — Bangladesh.

Last Friday in the University of Massachusetts Campus Center Auditorium, a panel discussion was held to discuss the political, economic and ethnic condition of the subcontinent 50 years later.

Organized by Nigar J. Khan, the assistant to the dean of the graduate school, the conference looked not only at the subcontinent's past but also at the future.

"We have come a long way since independence," Khan said in her opening. "But the challenges of the future remain daunting."

Graduate Dean Charlena Seymour agreed, saying the conference was an "important bridge to understanding India and Pakistan's culture and politics."

Pakistan's political journey

A history of martial law, protests leading to the beginnings of democracy is how Professor Anwar H. Syed of the UMass department of political science describes the political journey of Pakistan.

"This is still a time of transition," Syed said. "The tradition of personal rule [in the subcontinent] is very old."

The history of personal rule in the Indian subcontinent, according to Syed, was in place even before the British occupation. That tradition continued even after the British left.

"During the 11 years [after independence], there was no national election," Syed said. Rather, the people who elected themselves before independence stayed in power until they were ousted in 1958.

Four years of martial law followed the 1958 coup and a limited type of government was established. According to Syed, for Pakistan's population of 130 million — 80 thousand electoral college seats were available.

By 1968, Syed said that Pakistanis "felt insulted by this system" and initiated another protest, which resulted in the resignation of the government in March of 1969.

The history of martial law was not over though. Another general took control and in 1971, East Pakistan broke off from the country to form its own nation — Bangladesh.

According to Syed, the elections held in 1977 were rigged. Out of 207 seats in the National Assembly, "40 to 50 were rigged."

Once again, the Pakistanis protested and 11 more years of rule by the military followed — including eight years under martial law.

By 1985, democracy began to take root in Pakistan.

ROTC honors veterans in 24 hour vigil

By Jason Eiseman
Collegian Staff

The Army and Air Force ROTC programs held their annual Veterans' Day Vigil on Thursday and Friday, outside of the University of Massachusetts' Memorial Hall.

The vigil was held by an Army cadet and an Air Force cadet who stood next to an American flag and an M.I.A., P.O.W. flag, in what is called "Parade Rest." Like the guards at Buckingham Palace, cadets stared straight forward not moving or flinching while they stood vigil. The shifts lasted for one hour, in which cadets switched every 15 minutes, within their hour–long shift.

The entire vigil lasted 24 hours, and began Thursday at 11 a.m., with Army ROTC organized opening ceremonies. Paul McCauly, a senior history major, was the Master of Ceremonies for the opening ceremonies. McCauly began by reading a list of about 60 names of Massachusetts residents who died in battle, after every 10 names a member of the color guard would lay a flower on the memorial stone. Afterwards they sang the national anthem.

"I think it's good to show respect for someone who's passed away," McCauly said. "They appreciate us being out there," he said about the students who passed by the vigil.

On Friday at 11 a.m. closing ceremonies were held, and they were organized by the Air Force ROTC. Jason Brightman, a senior journalism major and a commander of the color guard, also gave credit to Greg Mullen for putting together the vigil.

"The whole ceremony is a great opportunity for ROTC units to show their colors, and at the same time honor the veterans," Brightman said.

During the closing ceremonies, two A–10 planes from Barnes Air Force Base conducted a fly–by to close the vigil, and there was a sounding of Taps to end the vigil.

"They flew really well, because of cloud cover," Brightman said.

"We're there to pay respect to people who [have] come before us," said Nick Pennola, a junior political science major and part of the Army ROTC. "The main purpose is to honor the veterans who [have] given their time and their lives for the service."

Both Army and Air Force ROTC cadets gave credit to each other for putting the event together.

"This is basically the only event we work on together," Brighman said.

Cadets in the service were more than willing to stand vigil in the cold weather, and in the early hours of Friday morning.

"It's not asking a lot," said Jeff Jablonski, cadet captain in the Army ROTC, and senior history major. "It's the least we can do for all of the veterans."

Jeff LeBlanc is a cadet lieutenant in the Army ROTC, and a senior history major.

"It's a very positive thing," he said. "Tomorrow's military is remembering the past. The whole idea of this is to remember the past."

Not all of the ROTC cadets had the opportunity to stand vigil or watch the ceremonies.

"There were just physically too many of us," LeBlanc said.

The vigil is an annual event, and has been going on for longer than most of today's cadets can remember.

Group looks for more volunteers

By Ken Tatro
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts and the Department of Mental Retardation is currently collaborating on a project to assist in the further integration of developmentally disabled individuals into the community.

The project is named Open Arms and according to project coordinator Ezzel Floranina, it was conceptualized by Amherst citizens who were concerned about the amount of social interaction their developmentally disabled children were receiving.

"Integration into the community life wasn't happening at the level [Amherst citizens] would like," Floranina said. "The accessibility is there, the physical setup but the support is not there."

Open Arms, which is defined by Floranina as a peer support project, proposes to match one or two community companions with one disabled project participant.

Each pair is to meet once a week, go out and interact with the community on a social level.

"The idea is to see what's happening in the community and go do it," Floranina said. "Whatever people do."

These activities could include going to concerts, plays and cafes, Floranina said.

There will also be monthly social gatherings for all the community companions and participants in the project.

Floranina believes that the fast pace of society often creates problems for developmentally disabled individuals and hopes that the community companions will assist in helping make the community more accessible for them.

Talk looks at US and Cuba

By Michelle Fongemie
Collegian Correspondent

AMHERST — A lecture on U.S.–Cuba cultural relations was given Wednesday, Nov. 5 by Alfredo Prieto at Hampshire College.

Prieto, who said he learned English mostly from rock and roll and American films, has a degree in Latin American literature from the University Center for Study of the Americas.

A native of Cuba, Prieto is in America to research America's influence on Cuban culture.

In general, Prieto said, "the cultural influence of the U.S. in Cuba has not been significantly studied."

Prieto described the relationship between the United States and Cuba as a "love/hate relationship," saying that the relationship has two dimensions, one of projection, the other in feelings of attraction.

The projection, Prieto said, comes from the political aspect of the relationship, while the feelings of attraction come from the image of modern America.

The 200–year plus relationship between the United States and Cuba, Prieto said, has had a significant impact on Cuban culture.

Prieto highlighted three areas that he said Americans implemented into Cuban culture. These are education, religion and tourism.

The teaching of English in Cuban schools, and the use of English textbooks, had the positive elements of modernization Prieto said, but also had a negative impact. "Natural history was told from an alien perspective," Prieto said.

He emphasized how the educational system in Cuba implemented by the Americans focused on teaching English and American history, as opposed to teaching Cuban history, or a combination of the two.

In terms of religion, Prieto spoke briefly about the American intervention. America, he said, in the process of implementing values essential to American modernization, had played a part in "deconstructing Cuban national identity."

The third element of influence, tourism, has more to do with the Americans than it does with the Cubans. Since the 1950s, Prieto said, Cuba has established a social life. On the other end, students never go home and the only contact is when mother tracks them down or money is needed," Davis said.

Davis discussed the issues of divorce, holidays and students who have families of their own.

She explained that divorce often causes loyalty problems between the two parents and many times students feel as if they must reject one parent in order to be loved by the other. Holidays are added stress to children of divorced parents because students are not always sure where to go.

The final group of speakers were from the offices of disability services available on campus.

Learning Disability Support Services (LDSS) began in 1985 with 11 cases and now 12 years later has over 600 cases.

"Students with learning disabilities are master methodologists," director of LDSS Patricia Silver said.

"They know how to study, and they study hard. They know how to seek help and are not often lost in the drift because they are used to getting the help that they need," she said.

Lastly, Pamela Marsh-Williams, associate dean and director of the Undergraduate Advising and Academic Support Center (UAASC), spoke about the development of UAASC, which is a collection of advising and academic support services that have always existed independently on campus.

These services are, Pre-major Advising Services, Pre-Law Advising, Domestic Exchange, Learning Support Services, Counseling and Assessment and LDSS.

"Academic advising has been identified as a key component of the University's Strategic Action Plan. UAASC will play a critical role in efforts to accomplish the University's goals to improve retention levels and the quality of the student's academic experience on this campus," Marsh-Williams said.

The symposium was funded by the Chancellor's Counsel on Community, Diversity and Social Justice and was organized by the Resource Network.

"Pakistan has had five general elections" since 1985, Syed said.

Democracy has been slow coming partly because "for hundreds of years, people of the Indian subcontinent have experienced personal rule," Syed said. "Democracy is not something you can learn from a book. The people of Pakistan want democracy. The desire is there, the will is there."

Economic development of the subcontinent

According to Professor J. Mohan Rao of the department of economics, "South Asia is one of the poorest regions in the world."

Citing numerous statistics, Rao said that unemployment in the region ranged from 25 to 30 percent, and that 44 percent of the subcontinent's 1.2 billion people live on less than $1 a day.

The three economies of India, Pakistan and Bangladesh have grown at different rates, with Pakistan the highest at 2.9 percent.

"It's essentially average growth," Rao said. He also said that "income inequality are roughly comparable across the three countries."

"These economic troubles have prompted much discussion," Rao said. He pointed out that poverty in the region could be attributed to historical and contemporary factors.

Rao used the example of child labor in India. One hundred million children between the ages of four and 14 work in India, due to endemic poverty.

"Child labor is a legacy of poverty," Rao said. "Or Is it the caste system?"

Rao pointed out that "great inequalities" exist in the caste hierarchy making the subcontinent a very inegalitarian region of the world.

"Caste and poverty are very powerful [factors for child labor]," Rao said. "India's poverty is not a good enough reason for child labor."

Ethnic minorities in the subcontinent

The "struggle over identity dominates the politics of the region," said Kavita Khory, a professor in the department of politics at Mount Holyoke College.

"Ethnic identity is dynamic," Khory said. "[It's] not a creation of political elites."

Khory cited the colonial legacy of new boundaries and territories created through the partition as one of the main reasons there has been violence over identity since 1947.

With the "introduction of the modern state system, group identification came to the forefront of politics," Khory said.

Violence also arises from the desire to protect language, culture and religion, Khory said.

"Minorities fear unique features will be swept away," Khory said, citing recent movements among the Sikhs, Punjabs, Hindu nationalists and the violence in Karachi and Kashmir.

"It is clear when groups are systematically excluded," Khory said. And in the case of an unresponsive and oppressive government, the state may respond with repression or violence. She also said that nationalistic feelings have arisen in response to the homogenous nationalism promoted by the government.

"[Governments] cannot ignore dynamics between ethnic groups," Khory said. "[A] singular identity will perpetuate violence."

DON T FORGET TO GIVE OVER THE UPCOMING HOLIDAYS

■ arms

Being developmentally disabled often "appears as a stigma," Floranina said. "However, it is equally important for the disabled to share who they are, their ways of looking at the world and acting in it."

Open Arms is currently looking for approximately 10-15 young adults to train and then to participate in the program as community companions. These participants may come form area high schools, UMass or from the non-student community.

Floranina stressed the importance of the non-student community becoming involved in Open Arms so there will be community companions to replace the student volunteers when they leave for breaks.

According to Floranina, UMass students who take part in the project may be able to receive community service credit, internship credit or use the experience as a term project.

Open Arms, which began in October, has received funding to run until June. Floranina says she hopes to have all the project participants in contact with each other by Thanksgiving.

Any member of the young adult community who is interested in becoming a community companion may contact Floranina at 256-4065.

national image of a "pleasure island."

Prieto told of American business men especially who travelled to Cuba to free themselves from their deeply rooted Puritan morals, and often found themselves in Cuba enjoying food, entertainment, and the company of women.

These three areas have been long since affected by American influence. But in the 1990s, Prieto said, the influence is more than ever before.

First, Prieto said, there is the issue of news. Contrary to popular belief, Cuba does have access to objective sources of news and that urban TV has incorporated important segments dedicated to news.

There is even CNN on Cuban television, Prieto pointed out.

"Cooperation in the communications field is possible regardless of the different philosophies of the roles of the press in each culture," Pietro said.

American pop culture can also be seen in Cuban radio and leisure television. American music, for example, is broadcasted by popular demand.

"I think such circumstances explain that Cuban listeners are very informed about American music," Prieto said.

Cubans have a preference for American movies too, said Prieto, and this is a long tradition. In the years 1990-1994, more than 90 percent of the films transmitted by Cuba were American.

Other expressions of American influence include the printing of many journals in Cuba, and there are some of these journals that are read and available in America, such as Temas.

Prieto said that he has personally seen another area of American culture find its way into the homes of Cubans, and this is the introduction of electronic games that have become increasingly popular among teenagers and younger children.

In Cuban schools, different techniques are discussed among school children in order to get better at the games, said Prieto, referring to a child of his own.

Style of dress has also had an impact on Cuba. Cubans prefer sports clothing these days, and they are very aware of what the quality clothes names are.

After his lecture, Prieto took a few questions from the small audience and said that one of the most important points that he wanted to get across was that "all this has taken place in the context of conflict between the U.S. and Cuba."

"I think that indicates very precisely that Cubans do not have hard feelings towards Americans," Prieto said.

Alvarado at UMass tonight

Lecture addresses human rights issues

Author and Honduran human rights leader Elvia Alvarado will give a lecture tonight at the University of Massachusetts Campus Center. Alvarado will speak on her struggle for agrarian reform and civil rights for the peasants of Honduras. She will also discuss her bestseller, Don't Be Afraid Gringo.

Alvarado is a peasant leader in Honduras. For the past 25 years, she has been at the forefront of human rights and land reform struggles in Honduras, the poorest country in Central America. She has been trying to educate the world on the affects of economic globalization, particularly on women and children.

As a social activist through the Catholic Church, Alvarado organized women in the Honduran countryside to distribute food to malnourished children. She went on to become a founding member of the Federation of Campesina Women (FEHMUC). This organization created women's cooperatives in rural Honduras. Alvarado is visiting the University as past of the Latin American Lecture Series sponsored by the Office of ALANA Affairs. She will begin speaking at 7 p.m. in room 168 of the Campus Center. All are welcome to attend. The lecture is free of charge.

Drug approval bill goes to House

By Jim Abrams
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Culminating years of work, the Senate yesterday approved legislation that will bring basic changes to the Food and Drug Administration and accelerate the approval of lifesaving drugs.

The House was expected to quickly agree to the bill and send it to President Clinton for his signature, giving Congress one major achievement as it brings a quarrelsome and highly partisan session to a close.

The bill, approved by voice vote in the Senate, expands patient access to new drugs for life-threatening illnesses, provides for accelerated approval of some drugs and medical devices and allows the Health and Human Services secretary to accredit independent third-party groups to speed up reviews of low-risk devices. It also reauthorizes a five-year program under which fees paid by drug companies have gone to hire 600 new reviewers who have helped cut the backlog in new medicine approvals. Incentives are included for developing and testing medicines for children.

"The process of moving this bill to enactment over the past four years has been long, difficult and contentious," said Sen. Edward Kennedy, (D-Mass.), who held up the legislation for weeks this fall as he fought for changes in provisions he thought were detrimental to consumers.

Sen. Jim Jeffords, (R-Vt.), chairman of the Labor Committee that shepherded the bill through the Senate, said it was the first major reform of the FDA in 30 years. It "will have a positive impact on the lives of millions of Americans for decades to come," he said. The bipartisan agreement came after extensive negotiations on a number of controversial issues.

UMass debt to GEO overdue

In June of 1996, the Graduate Employee Organization's (GEO) contract with the University expired. Since that time, the University has shown itself to be less than interested in settling new terms of employment with the union. That is, of course, to the University's advantage — it means that GEO members are not getting the raises and other increases in benefits that they deserve.

Why should undergraduates at UMass care? Because GEO members are us, not them. They are our fellow students, and they are our teaching assistants. Many of them teach our required general education courses. The way the University treats graduate students has a direct impact on the quality of undergraduate education, because they are responsible for a significant part of the work that keeps the University alive.

GEO's contract proposals, such as affordable flexible childcare and wage increases, are not luxury items that the union is trying to milk the University for; they are basic necessities that will allow graduate students to live above the poverty level — the most basic of rewards for a job well done. UMass must agree to meet these needs without further delay.

Settling the GEO contract quickly and fairly also makes good financial sense for the University. It is an investment in excellence which should be a priority for the administration. With wages nearly the lowest among comparable schools, UMass is not in a position to attract the most qualified graduate students.

We encourage all students to attend the GEO teach-in actions at the Student Union on Nov. 13 and 14 in order to inform themselves further about this urgent issue. And we urge the administration to settle the GEO contract now.

A true story

So, there I was walking behind the Worcester DC last week, when I noticed a brown clump in the middle of the road. "What the heck is this?" I asked myself. At first I thought it was a paper bag that some clown crumpled into a ball and thoughtlessly threw away. Upon closer inspection, it appeared to be workman's knee pads that could have fallen out of a construction vehicle.

I am mistaken on all counts. Imagine my surprise? I had stumbled upon a stack of five women's breasts, meticulously crafted out of rubber latex, and anatomically accurate in every detail.

For a moment I felt like an idiot standing there in the middle of the road holding a bunch of rubber breasts. What if someone should come along and find me there with them? I was suddenly overtaken by the fear of being grilled by a burly security guard wanting to know what I was doing in the middle of the road with women's breasts. I took a look around and quickly stuffed them into my jacket pocket.

"I never thought that trying to do the right thing could be so humiliating. Have you ever asked someone, 'Excuse me, but I just found five women's breasts that look rather valuable and I'm trying to locate the owner?"

Roy Rutanen

The passing thought of an outrageous Halloween costume, quickly gave way to the notion of being a more responsible member of an academic community. After all, University Health Services is just down the road, and they could be needed for prosthesis purposes, or perhaps they are part of someone's anatomy and physiology project. In any event, judging from the detail, craftsmanship and potential value of the breasts (financial or emotional), I decided to make a few calls and track down the owner. I had no idea what I was getting into.

I never thought that trying to do the right thing could be so humiliating. Have you ever asked someone, "Excuse me, but I just found five women's breasts that look rather valuable and I'm trying to locate the owner?"

My very first call was to Lost and Found. Once I convinced the woman it was not a joke, she stopped laughing long enough to tell me if I didn't find the owner, at least I wouldn't be lonely that weekend. Then it was on to the Biology Department. And very likely the women at Health Services and Women's Studies are still snickering. The woman at the Police Department, however, was extremely professional — probably because our conversation was being recorded — and suggested I try the Marshall Hall Art Annex.

Having grown weary of principally evoking fits of hilarity to my noble breast-quest, by the time I called Marshall Hall I was relieved to get an answering machine. I didn't have to go through more snickering and laughter, and simply left the message, "I just found five latex breasts and I'm trying to find the owner..." — pause — "... now that you've stopped laughing. I'm not kidding, if you know who they belong to, have them call me."

I returned to my studies and a few hours passed. Around mid-afternoon, I received a call from a young lady who said, "I understand that you found my breasts?" With no further wise cracks, punch lines or other whimsical comments forthcoming, I concluded that she must be the legitimate owner, and like Cervantes' Don Quixote, my quest ended.

As it turned out she was an artist working on an exhibit to be in Herter this April, which will include numerous latex breasts. Because they apparently take a considerable amount of time and effort to create, she was delighted to have them returned, and hastily came over to retrieve the missing body parts. Perhaps it'll mean a wee bit of positive karma in my future, so I got that going for me.

Yet, as she departed, I felt a warm glow, mixed with a melancholy contentment. I never got her name, but I'm looking forward to seeing her breasts again this April at Herter. Although we were together for only a short time, do you think they'll remember me?

Supports Alvarez motion

To the Editor:

As a former SGA Senator of two years, I feel compelled to respond to the current dispute regarding the ALANA Caucus and Area Government appointed seats, as contested by freshman Senator Alvarez.

I applaud Alvarez's initiative in standing up for what he believes to be an inconsistency and flaw within the student governance system. In fact, I agree with him. Student government is a privilege and can be an empowering tool if implemented properly. However, the current distribution of electoral and appointed seats manipulates the voice of the students in a manner that is somewhat distorted. Senate seats need to be filled by those individuals that are motivated, productive, and proactive — regardless of origin. Those who are truly interested in the welfare of all students attending the University are the people who will excel in the position of senator. Since the ALANA Caucus has already proven itself a powerful advocacy and activist organization, I see no reason why that power and energy could not simply be directed to encouraging the members of its various communities to run for elected positions. ALANA leadership has been and can be achieved without the assistance of appointments.

It disturbs me to see lines of division being drawn so sharply and walls obstructing communication being put up between individuals and groups who are supposed to be protecting our common interests as UMass students. Especially horrifying are comments such as the remark made by Ceylin Guillermo of Southwest on November 6, stating "What hurts me and other members of the ALANA community is that Mr. Alvarez is supposed to be one of us..." Let's focus on the fact that Alvarez is attempting to do his job as he sees fit. The emphasis should not be placed on who he is supposed to be, but rather who he is.

I challenge the undergraduate senate to evaluate the status of representation and the validity of that status before shooting down the motions that come before them. They may seem at first glance to be extreme, but work together and use your power wisely. Students have become conditioned to expect bad press in the Collegian on Thursday mornings regarding SGA, and we are counting on you to make a positive difference this year!

ALANA Caucus appointments are not undemocratic

To the Editor:

I am a legal resident of the state of North Carolina. I therefore read with great interest the Collegian report (Nov. 6) that SGA Senator Alvarez had cited "a ruling by the federal court of North Carolina" to support his theory that senate appointments by the ALANA Caucus are undemocratic.

Although the sentence is cut short and not clearly completed in the article's continuation on page 2, I deduced a sentence ending that has Mr. Alvarez claiming that the court ruling to which he refers "states it is illegal to set quo[ta]" for elections.

I am curious to know to which ruling he refers. I was active in a number of political campaigns in North Carolina. Never once have I heard mention of a court ruling making election "quotas illegal."

There is the case in which some North Carolina voting districts were ruled to have been unconstitutionally gerrymandered. These same "unconstitutional" districts, among the most integrated in the state, in 1994 sent to Congress the first two black representatives from North Carolina since 1901.

"Our democratic" system has long made allowances for constituents of like interests to maximize their voting strength. The same courts that charged North Carolina with gerrymandering when the outcome was increased representation for people of color allow for drawing districts to safeguard incumbent seats, create concentrations of voters heavily affiliated with one party or the other, or unite people of similar socioeconomic background. Each of these is a variation on the perfectly legal and "democratic" theme of "fair allocation."

My understanding of the ALANA Senate appointments is not that 15 percent of Senate seats are reserved for random colored folk to claim at will. Rather, a number of seats proportionate to the ALANA population are allocated for representatives of that population — a perfectly reasonable step to achieve the "democratic" goal of fair representation.

These representatives are not required to be ALANA students — only to be able to work for the interests of the ALANA population at UMass. The ALANA Caucus appointments, in being open to all UMass students, are not any sort of "quota" of ALANA students in the Senate.

Sen. Alvarez and his supporters may believe that ALANA interests will be adequately represented at UMass without any concerted effort on the part of the Senate. If he believes this, then by all means continue working toward dismantling the appointment process. Just don't base it on any half-understood, misconstrued, or down-right twisted legal theory.

Soaps really do suck

To the Editor:

In response to Jacob Fanning's editorial "Clearing up the myths about soap operas" (Nov. 3):

Let me begin by stating that I am exactly like Fanning's neighbor who berates soap operas and the entire genre without having watched a single episode in its entirety. What irks me into responding to Fanning's editorial is the glaring flaw in his defense of soaps: content.

Content is what makes soap operas stand out as the worst garbage on television, save maybe daytime talk shows and Bob Saget. It takes only five to 10 minutes for any intelligent human being to recognize that soap operas are total trash.

If Fanning thinks soap operas are only attacked because of bad acting and low-quality sets, he is wrong. "The Simpsons" is a cartoon, and the quality of that show is so many levels above soaps that Homer wouldn't wipe his butt with a script from "Days of Our Lives."

As far as the claim that "90210" and "Party of Five" are also soaps — Fanning is damn right! They are more crap, except they air at prime time. Soaps don't threaten my masculinity, they threaten my brain cells!

My harsh attitude toward soaps is perhaps a little too critical. After all, they are not targeted toward intelligent viewers. They are made for those who want to lose a few hours of their lives everyday to mind-sucking vegetation.

In defense of Promise Keepers

To the Editor:

In response to the editorial "Promise Keepers bad at life" (Nov. 4):

As a man who holds deeply to his faith, I was taken aback by the editorial. First, I question the idea that faith is opposed to reason. Without faith, humankind would fall into a never-ending cycle of repeated failures and frustration. This young chemist did not experience the piecing together of the periodic table of the elements, nor have I repeated the experiments necessary to do so. I accept the documentation of these facts as true on faith and continue forward with research. My own experiences in research then serve to strengthen my faith in the basic principles of chemistry.

The Bible is a historical document that claims to be the Word of God, and it outlines the relationship between God and humankind. Some people choose to trust in this document, some do not. Although the Bible affects my life much more than chemistry, my faith in the Bible is not so different from my faith in chemistry books. I accept the Bible as truth and my experiences have only served to strengthen my faith in God.

The second comment that I find insulting is that the Promise Keepers "uphold every idea that perpetuates (moral) crisis)." Since when does holding fast the 10 Commandments and the teachings of Jesus constitute moral crisis? In my many years of reading and studying the Bible I have never come across any teachings encouraging immorality. The Bible may be morally constricting for some, but uphold moral crisis?

I do commend Didion for suggesting that men should stand together to oppose moral decline. However, he recommends that they stand together on the grounds of their own reason rather than the grounds of religion. Forgive my bias, but I would rather see men standing on the grounds of a religion that has been established and concrete for centuries (Christian or otherwise) than on an ever-changing, collective, generational reason. This is not a group of people who want to run the country; these are simply men who take responsibility for their failures and are trying to correct them according to God's standards rather than their own.

The history of African art and its role as a part of our past, present and future

Raising the consciousness of the Africans who now inhabit the soil of America, showing the soulfulness that is so obviously hidden within, is the underlining goal. However to examine the importance of this form of African expression known as art is to examine the African soul. There is no other culture that defines themselves as immortal through art as Africanas. From the colonial period and through the war of the world part one to the progressive period of the '60s and '70s to modernism the poetry of African art stands as a testament to the struggles of Afrcans in America. Struggles with self identity and cultural loyalty. Linda James Myers puts it perfectly.

"From ancient times within African cultures the role of the artist has been one of elevating the consciousness of the people. Providing them signs and symbols of the higher forms of life and human functioning, the aesthetician encouraged, educated and reflected those aspects of being to which humanity must aspire to fulfill its purpose," Myers said.

Nevertheless in the 19th century when Afro-American artists began to get attention, they were deemed untrue. Untrue to that which was perceived as African. These early artists however were not untrue to their African past but instead sought to tell of their unjust situation. The African artist of the late 19th century were not to blame for their cultural isolation nor were they to be ridiculed for what they perceived to be their truth. Moreover, the cultural ties to Africa of these early Africans were sold aboard slave ships, for with the advent of slavery came savage disconnection from Africa and assimilation to "mastas" with whips. Visual artistry was traded for hard work in fields filled with cotton plants, rice in Georgia and maize.

Nevertheless, Elsa Honig Fine wrote: "In North America, particularly in urban areas, the slaves typically was sold as part of a small group or as an individual, so that cultural ties with Africa were broken quickly. Consequently, the slaves easily fell victim to the colonialists' desire to suppress all customs that did not conform to the familiar patterns of Western tradition."

The African artist who sought freedom through his art was now ridiculed and was told by both whites and blacks that they were somewhat fake. Ironically enough, these were the same whites who told stories of Africans sleeping with monkey's engaging in cannibalism, and that Africans were sub-humans by natural selection.

Omar Gayle

Furthermore, to examine the depth of Afro-American art and its roots we will have to dissect the African past, present and future, from colonialism through the Atlantic slave trade to America; where slavery lead to segregation. Only through the examination of these tragedies can we begin to understand the canvas on which the artists of today bare their souls.

When the colonists descended upon the land of Africa under the banner of 'Protecorate' through Christianity to promote their capitalist interest. They took for granted the importance of the cultural aesthetic that was present and so the importance of which was not dispensated to the New World. Said fact lead to years of neglect by the new assimilated world and so African art and craftsmanship were not of importance until the slaveholders in America sought to use this to their advantage. Samella Lewis summed it up like this:

"With respect to crafts, the continuation of African artistic traditions under slavery had a somewhat more secure base. As the colonies expanded, the demand for skilled craftsmen exceeded the supply. For example, in 1731 there was reportedly only one potter in all of South Carolina. Consequently, slaveholders frequently found it worthwhile to use some of their slaves as artisans rather than as agricultural laborers. Many of the enslaved Africans proved to be familiar with one or more of the trades needed in the colonies' rapidly developing society. Among these bondsmen were carpenters, metalworkers, potters, sculptors, weavers and designers of various wares."

Nonetheless, from early times African art has reflected the everyday life and struggles of a people. It is said that art is the "ultimate expression of a civilized people." If such is the case, Africans were civilized long before the onset of European rule, and probably even before Europe itself; as proven by the paintings and sculptures dating as far back as the bronze age and cave paintings.

Furthermore, the calamity of the African experiences didn't subdue the African spirit and creativity, instead said calamity was funneled to the canvas via the soul.

Confucius once said, "By nature, men are very much the same; it is through practice that they drift apart." Nevertheless, Africans developed apart from Europeans and is its own entity. For this reason the African aesthetic cannot be judged by/on the same criterium, and vice versa. Moreover, the rhythm that is so profound within the African self can only be pronounced through its own people.

However, as I have stated earlier the function of African American art is to tell "The Story." A story that started since the time of cave paintings to the Nok culture of Nigeria, to the "Migration of the Negro" — a story so vividly told by Jacob Lawrence and also Hale Woodruff who put oil on canvas to tell the story of "The Amistad Slave Rebellion" from start to finish, while life in the deep south was/is seen through the eyes of Aaron Douglas, who very often would contrast the Afro-American within the natural setting of Africa. This truth can be seen in his painting that is titled "The Negro in African Setting." The role of the Afro-American woman through the masculinity of hard work was depicted to the point of near perfection through abstraction by John Biggers in his masterpiece, "Washer Woman." This drawing seeks not only to offer a view of the physical form but rather offer insight into the soul of "a people."

Ironically enough, during the Harlem Renaissance Afro-American artists struggled with self identity, Lewis writes:

"During this period, forces for self-expression, both internal and external, had to decided whether to identify with their culture, accepting and exploiting the heritage, or with the international art movement, accepting and exploiting the security of the European artistic tradition."

Nevertheless one might ask, "What else besides assimilation could cause the African-American artist to question himself?" To answer this question one would need to look at one of the reasons for the onset of the Harlem Renaissance.

"The Renaissance took root in the social and intellectual movements of the Booker T. Washington era and was nourished by the quest for education and wealth," Fine wrote.

Basically, because the patrons of Afro-American art for the most part were white, the artist of this era sought not to offend, meaning they had to struggle to find equilibrium between truths.

Nevertheless certain artists used this forum rather to find themselves, such was the case with Aaron Douglas, Jacob Lawrence, Hale Woodruff and Henry O. Tanner. This conclusion came about after examining the paintings of these various artists, in search of the soul behind the brushes. Douglas is said to be "the leading exponent of the visual arts during the Harlem Renaissance."

However, the creativity of the African-American artist didn't end with the Harlem Renaissance, but rather transformed itself to a radical depiction of the African-Amerikkkan truth.

"Following World War II there developed an intense struggle by African Americans for equal rights in all aspects of American Life. In the course of this struggle for equal economic, political and social opportunity, African American artists embraced the concept of self determination through self expression, which involved the demand that they formulate their own aesthetic principle," Lewis wrote.

The role of the African-American artists is to tell their story, and that they did. Though the movement towards righteousness so to speak, did not materialize until the progressive period of the '60s and '70s, the African soul was always there, sometimes silent sometimes prominent. Artists such as Kay brown and Cliff Joseph were pioneers of this era. They only represented a minute speck of the movement itself. It was Deutscvher and Chein who concluded that "segregation is a special source of frustration for persons who are segregated." This frustration was vented through the only medium that offered a permanent place in time.

The Tear Drop
By Hugh Collins

That's very romantic
It is like a tear drop
That remains in the duct of the eye
To lubricate its movement
Silky is the feeling
Like lovers between the sheets.
Slow is the motion
Like the thrust with eternal passion.
Tender is the contact
Like the friction generated by the lips.
Sensitive is it's exoskeleton,
Like the nipples when touched by
A tongue, a finger, or kisses from my lips.

But if that tear drop falls
All hell breaks loose when this love stalls
Falling to the ground
It splashes with an echo
Reflecting all of life's despair
Disintegrating the many elements
Instilled in our hearts.
Hurt, hate, stress, lies, deceit
Pain, ignorance.
And all possible elements
That causes us Black men and women
To be separated.
No love in the community,
Lack of humility and unity.

And if that tear drop is not regained
It won't be so romantic after all.
No lubrication other than that
Which keeps us slipping back
Into the pit of despair.
Slow would be the motion to progress
Tender would be our hearts that yield
To a society of inequality
Injustice and irresponsibility
Insensitive would be our feelings
To the hurting of our feelings,
To the hurting of our own people,
Our own brothers and sisters.

And if that tear drop should be regained,
Hard would be the struggle.
Tough will be the fight
Dark will be the night of plight
Incredible will be the journey
Before we see the light.
It won't be romantic after all.

Along the Color Line: Globalization Cyberspace and racism — part one

The most powerful yet grossly misunderstood political term popularized in the decade of the 1990's is "Globalization." Globalization refers to the massive revolution in information characterizes the development of the entire world. It is also, to a considerable extent, the consolidation of the technological cultures and the private market economic model of the development represented by the United States, Western Europe and Japan since World War II.

Dr. Manning Marable

The creation of cyberspace technology during the past decade has radically transformed the way people communicate and conduct business, from the level of our neighborhoods to the entire globe. These changes can be measured in literally every aspect of human endeavor and activity. For example, technology is rapidly replacing the necessity for certain forms of labor. Workers who were trained to do manufacturing and labor intensive industry are being replaced by machines. Most businesses have radically transformed their entire procedures for producing, distributing and marketing products. At the level of daily life, the new technology is expressed in the elimination of paper and currency as mediums of exchange. E-mail and the Internet are increasingly the way millions of people communicate with each other. Books and newspapers are rapidly becoming anachronisms. ATM and debit cards are replacing advancement and economic development.

The real question we should ask ourselves about globalizatlon is in whose interest does It serve? Who will set the rules for globalization? What nations, classes or political elites are potentially the biggest winners or losers? And perhaps most importantly, from a humanistic perspective, can globalization serve a broader social justice purpose: the utilization of technology and the information revolution for the reduction and even the elimination of poverty, disease and ignorance? Will globalization reinforce or retard the forces of race hatred, social intolerance and nationalism? We may find that in the environment of globalized capitalism, racial divisions and hierarchies structured around social inequality may actually be strengthened and reinforced by the new innovations and developments in global technology. We may be confronting new forms of globalized racism as we enter the new millennium.

What may be the key components in the construction of a new global racism?

One major factor to consider is global demographics. In the past thirty years, the world has witnessed the greatest mass migrations in human history. Hundreds of millions of people are today on the move. The two greatest waves of migration are, first, from rural to urban areas, and second, from the southern part of the hemisphere to the north.

The transformation of racial demographics we have seen inside the United States is also rapidly occurring across the globe. Experts in population growth point to three basic factors which will greatly change the size and racial/ethnic composition of the global population by the middle of the next century:

First, declining birth rates and the use of birth control especially in developed and Industrialized societies; second, the Increase In life expectancies In all countries, and falling rates of mortality; and third, the rapid increase in all populations above the age of 65.

What are the racial implications of these demographic trends? Today, the population of Africa is approximately the same as the populations of Europe, the United States and Canada combined, roughly one to one. By the year 2060, the ratio of Africa's population to that of Europe and North America will be three to one. Today, the population ratio between the developing third world and industrialized western world (United States, Japan, Europe, etc.) is roughly four to one. By 2060, this ratio will be seven to one. People of European descent, who are already a numerical minority on this planet, will become by the end of the next century, a dwindling and fairly insignificant group in terms of size. The paradox of course is that this is also the group that controls a disproportionate share of power and resources.

Another factor which may contribute to the possibility of global racism is unequal access to technology. A century ago, people of African descent in the United States, and Africa and Asian people throughout the world, were dominated by forms of political control called "Jim Crow segregation" and "colonialism." Their political domination was based in part on their racial and national identity. Technology was used to reinforce the rule of white supremacy and economic exploitation. Now, a century later, a new color line is emerging: the technologically advanced "haves," whose civilization is based on the latest technologies and the information revolution, versus the miseducated, under-educated "have-nots," who are overwhelmingly non-European. Will Africa and much of the Third World face, in the not-too-distant future, a new "high technology-based colonialism?"

Will the new Jim Crow of the twenty-first century be created in cyberspace?

Dr. Manning Marable is Professor of History and Director of the Institute for Research in African-American Studies at Columbia University, New York City. "Along the Color Line" is distributed free of charge and regularly appears in over 325 black and progressive publications worldwide.

WilsonWesley's third is a winner

WHERE EVIL SLEEPS
Valerie Wilson Wesley
G.P. Putnam Sons

In this third novel of the Tamara Hayle mystery series, on the quest for some hard-earned peace of mind, private eye Tamara Hayle leaves her native Newark and heads for Kingston, Jamaica, on holiday. Unfortunately, there's no rest for Tamara as trouble follows and finds her before she can really get the opportunity to kick back and relax.

Once again, Valerie Wilson Wesley constructs a fast paced story in which her protagonist, the headstrong Tamara, draws on the nature of evil as she confronts a host of sinister characters who force her to look inward. Several less than wise choices propel Tamara into the middle of a five man search for hundreds of thousands of dollars in drug money.

Tamara's first mistake is spending an evening, club hopping with three fellow New Jerseyites she meets poolside at the cheap hotel that is her home away from home for the week.

Tamara deems Lilah Love, her husband Sammy Lee Love, and sidekick Delaware "bad news" Brown, and suspects that Sammy Lee abuses his wife. Compelled by a sense of social responsibility and a glint of fear that she reads into Lilah's eyes, Tamara tags along hoping to help the younger woman wise up.

Before Lilah has a chance to hear what Tamara has to tell her, the lights in the club go out, shots are fired and two men are dead. Promised a considerable amount of money and coerced once again by Lilah's childlike desperation, Tamara jumps from the pan of hanging out with criminals and into the fire of running for her life.

Failing to heed her grandmother's past warnings that evil begets evil, Tamara ends up failing into even greater danger. Wilson Wesley tastefully sprinkles bits of southern speech in Tamara's grandmother's voice and folk wisdom throughout the novel.

Wilson Wesley has an ear for convincing dialogue. As she replicates the voice of Tamara's grandmother, it's familiar and warm. She cleverly contrasts the speech of the older, wiser Tamara and that of the young, devious Lilah. Wilson Wesley also captures in conversation, the bruitishness of Sammy Lee Love, as well as the tenderness of the Jamaican- born Basil Dupree.

Tamara describes Basil as the man from her past who "makes a shiver of lust rumble through the pit of your belly whenever they cross your mind." Basil is just the ticket to mellowing out all of the violence going on in Tamara's chaotic world.

Where Evil Sleeps is a quick and fun read. The characters are motivated solely by the all mighty dollar. The upside of the entire story is Tamara's serious kill or be killed determination. Tamara is a familiar, down-to-earth and likable character. She is resourceful and responsible, with an obsession that justice be served. Tamara Hayle is a heroine with do-right-woman written all over her.

The secret of Oasis revealed

By Marty Keane
Collegian Staff

THE VERVE
Avalon Ballroom
Nov. 8

BOSTON — To the uninitiated, the band who headlined at the Avalon Ballroom Saturday night might have been confused for one of their more famous British contemporaries.

Surprisingly then, there was an almost palpable sense of anticipation for the Verve's triumphant return to the States following an 18-month hiatus.

Like Oasis, the Verve are almost totally stoic onstage, and help to define the term "shoegazer band" for the '90s. That is, except for their frontmen who have enough charisma themselves to make up for their bandmates lack thereof.

Along with Oasis' Liam Gallagher, the Verve's Richard Ashcroft has an unmistakable presence that clearly says, "We're here, listen up Yanks." Indeed, during their 85- minute set, nary an eye cast a glance anywhere but at the stage. Unlike the unfortunate circumstances that occurred at the Jane's Addiction show Friday in which much of the action was happening off-stage (barricades collapsing, half- naked dancing girls on towers in the middle of a gym) there were no extracurricular activities here.

Thanks not only to Ashcroft's star-quality — but also some formidable musical chops — this English quintet simply command their audience's attention in a very "love us or leave us alone" pose. Inside the Avalon's smoke-filled and jam-packed ballroom, the crowd wildly embraced the first part of that statement, and then some. It was love at first sight.

Opening with "The Rolling People" off their superlative new release Urban Hymns, the Verve went for the knockout punch early, and scored big. Live, they're a curious brew of aural intoxication; equal parts white noise and understated elegance.

As Ashcroft would demonstrate to no end, he seems to have taught that loutish Gallagher kid a thing or two about acting like a rock star as he shook his gaunt frame while oozing cockney swagger.

"Catching The Butterfly" and a distortion-heavy "This Is Music" both brazenly announced their arrival. This was especially true of the latter, as when Ashcroft proclaimed the title's refrain, there was little room for argument. Their next move however, would prove the boldest of the night.

Instead of saving it for the expected encore, "Bitter Sweet Symphony" was boldly dispensed of next. It's because of this song — probably the finest rock single of the year — that the Verve have built up such a maelstrom of support in these parts and to play it 15 minutes in was a risk, to put it mildly. Not to worry though, the song's depressingly real lyrics ("You're a slave to money, then you die") resonated through Avalon's every crevice.

On "Sonnet," "Weeping Willow" and a poignantly self- confessional "The Drugs Don't Work," Ashcroft brandished an acoustic guitar to underlay lead guitarist Nick McCabe's effortlessly flowing leads, as did keyboard guru Simon Tong.

The result of this tertiary guitar attack helps to explain why the Verve can be placed among the leaders in contemporary music who have achieved power by turning down the volume and aiming straight for the heart through quietly uplifting songs.

To whatever extent they embrace quiet solitude, the Verve still know how to grab for the throat. A generous four-song encore was highlighted by "Lucky Man"'s bellowing bass lines, courtesy of Simon Jones and a rapturous run through their signature song, "History."

But it was the closing "Come On" which said all that needed to be said. Amidst a kaleidoscope of psychedelic lights and McCabe's guttural guitar squalls, Ashcroft accentuated the song's primal beat with the most glorious tambourine rattling this side of... Liam Gallagher.

For those who were there, the unalienable secret of Liam 101 was revealed. The answer is the Verve, who were around more than a few years before Oasismania was even in its infancy.

And don't you forget it for a second.

The Verve played at the Avalon Ballroom last weekend.

The dish on "All My Children"

Whoa, what a difference a week makes! Or at least that's what the fans of "All My Children" and "General Hospital" must be thinking. Last week was the week of the "big payoff" for "AMC" fans. Edmund finally found out the truth about Skye's deception (the switched paternity tests) à la Erica Cain and oh, was there hell to pay or at least for Skye. The long awaited scene between a betrayed Edmund and a clearly distraught Skye was absolutely riveting and both John Callahan and Carrie Genzel did not disappoint. In watching the scenes I actually felt, dare I say it... a twinge of sympathy for Skye, a woman whose entire world had just been shattered. The whole situation is utterly tragic. Call me a sucker for a pretty face and a woman in dire straits but let me play devil's (how appropriate) advocate for just a second. Skye made a mistake and while her motives were pure (Edmund's love), her actions left a lot to be desired. The mistake snowballed out of control and Skye felt herself unable to stop it (talk about the fate's working against you). Then the woman, riddled with guilt as the secret ate away at her soul, finally had the courage to do the right thing so she's writes Maria a note revealing the true paternity of Maddie. What happens? The plane crashes just as Maria reads it. Then she tries to come clean to Edmund right after the plane crash but finds out (after she spills her guts) that he can't hear her because he's been rendered deaf as a result of the trauma. Notice a trend here. Finally, after Dimitri pushes Edmund up against a wall, she decides to come clean a third time but Dimitri (Mr. Satan himself) catches wind of her deception and threatens to kill her if she so much as whispers the truth to Edmund. Talk about an impossible situation! You can't say she never tried to do the right thing. Of course, she has to go and blow it all by tipping off Dimitri, who has now flown off to Europe with Maddie and his bitch of a wife, Gloria, to escape the authorities and Edmund. Don't despair though because Edmund and Tad the Cad are hot on Dimitri's trail (rumor is they'll be doing a little number in drag to fool Dimitri and company. Sounds awfully reminiscent of Mac and Kevin's stunt on "GH").

A few more quick notes while we're on the subject of "AMC," what an SOB Jim has turned out to be. He's such a sleaze! Why Laura is keeping hush about this creep is beyond me! Poor Brooke, victimized by yet another man (ah, some things never change).

Soap Chat

On "GH"... headwriter, Bob Guza, has managed to turn the "pumpkin" that "GH" had become during his absence into a magical "carriage." "GH" has never been better! Well, the skeletons were flying out of the closets last week as the women in "Port Charles" started to feel the heat. AJ finally learned the truth about Carly's actual due date and Stefan caught on to Alexis' scheme. I can't wait to hear how Carly gets out of this one... or maybe she won't this time. The house of cards is beginning to fall and I can't wait to see what happens when the dust clears. Expect a game of cat and mouse between Alexis and Stefan in the coming weeks (Stefan may have met his match this time around. My bet's on Alexis).

In a bit of news this week...

- Rumors are circulating that Michael Nadar (Dimitri) might be on his way out of Pine Valley as early as February. His contract is up for renewal and there's been some mumbling about Disney's (ABC's parent company) displeasure with the publicity surrounding Nadar's recent run in with the law (he was arrested for driving under the influence and for assaulting a police officer. Nadar has pleaded not guilty to the charges and maintains his innocence, however). The fact that "AMC" has painted his character into a corner has also fueled the speculation regarding his departure (then again, redeeming nasty characters has become somewhat of a daytime staple. Just look at the progress they've made with Todd on "One Life To Live").
- Beth Chamberlin will be reprising her role as Beth Spaulding on "Guiding Light." I knew it was only a matter of time before the other shoe dropped. Phillip and Harley's relationship was going a little too well.

Sink or Swim

- John and Stefano's little chat on the pier. How very anti-climatic not to mention poorly acted. Drake Hogestyn (John) just may make me eat my words concerning the wealth of talent that daytime has to offer.
- Jack and Jen on "Days Of Our Lives." Boring!
- Lucy and Scott on "Port Charles." Why is it that writers have completely ignored the sexual tension and chemistry that these two used to have and could possibly have again. I'm not suggesting that the show break up Lucy and Kevin (because I happen to love the two of them together) but why not at least throw a monkey wrench into the fold. These two have a long and complicated history together not to mention a few loose ends and feelings that were left unresolved. To ignore it would be a waste. They need to start playing dirty with this Rex fellow too. It's time to take off the kid gloves, guys. These two used to be the master at manipulation and now look what they've become — victims. The Lucy I know and love is no victim, she would've had this schmuck for lunch.
- The axing of Carrie Genzel on "AMC." The fact that Skye managed to squeeze even a twinge of sympathy from me is largely due to the charm and edge that Carrie has given the character. She's been an asset to the show and her talent will be sorely missed, at least by this viewer. Stupid move "AMC."

Swim:

- Phyllis' S&M encounter with Michael. And who says "the Young & the Restless" can't be entertaining? What a riot! I'd expect nothing less from Genou city's resident vixen!
- Jack and Carly on "As The World Turns." Can you spell, s-e-x-u-a-l-t-e-n-s-i-o-n!
- Susan's theatrics on "DOOL." Her reaction to Stefano was a hoot!

Understanding Eating Disorders:
Strategies for Friends and Families
Tuesday, October 14, 1997
Room 904-08
6:30 - 8 p.m. - Murray Lincoln Campus Center, UMass

I think my roommate has an eating disorder.
How can I be sure? What should I do?
I think my sister is anorexic and she isn't getting any help.
How can I convince her to see a professional?
Who should I suggest.. Where should she go?
I'm concerned about my friend who has bulimia.
She says it's under control, but I don't think it is.
I'm really afraid... What can I do to help?

If you are concerned about someone who you know or suspect is struggling with an eating disorder, come to this informal workshop to explore how you can help and cope with these issues.

talk about them all."

Capehart was a running back for the Terriers in the late 1960s, and a member of the 1969 BU team that played in the Pasadena Bowl. But now Capehart calls Bangor, ME home. And with the recent demise of BU's program, along with work commitments, Capehart said he hadn't been back to Nickerson Field in over a decade.

Without much notice, Capehart got in his car Saturday morning and headed south for Boston, alone.

"I felt I needed to come," he said. "I owe a lot for what this school gave to me."

Surviving a freezing rain storm in Maine and New Hampshire, Capehart stumbled onto the soaked field of his glory days in just under five hours.

"It's a beautiful sight," he said. He gestured towards the Terrier team charging onto the field for the last time. "It really hurts me to see it all go."

Glen Riley, of Boston, has been coming to Terrier games for almost 20 years. A 1983 graduate of BU, Riley said he has followed the team through their good times — most notably their tournament run in 1994 — up until their recent struggles.

"Just because they haven't been winning, doesn't mean you don't come out to root for them," he said. "And it definitely doesn't mean you should cut the whole program."

Capehart, angry with the sudden news of the program, shared Riley's sentiments.

"This is wrong," he said. "They're taking away our tradition, because we haven't been winning?"

BU President John Silber announced the dropping of the program because of NCAA Title IX pressures to address the needs of women's athletics at BU. Capehart believes the football program — which reportedly loses almost $3 million a year — could easily have been saved.

Capehart said that BU gives out 63 scholarships for football, but can never sell out Nickerson Field.

"The tickets are $10 apiece," he said. "Who would want to spend that to see them lose each game?"

Capehart added that years ago, BU played teams like Holy Cross, Colgate and Bucknell who have restrictions on scholarships and have maintained successful programs. Holy Cross was even able to build a new stadium a few years ago, he said.

"They bought a Cadillac, and now they're complaining about the costs," he said of the administration. "You have to have a budget, I have one and so does everyone else. They weren't responsible about theirs."

The angered students in the crowd showed their distaste with the decision towards the end of the game, chanting "We want football!" and "Silber Sucks!"

But when the game ended, the BU football team went out with class. Many players stood on benches, saluting the fans with their helmets. Others headed toward the middle of the field where many UMass players met and exchanged words with them.

Several hundred fans rushed the field where they tried, unsuccessfully, to tear down either of the goal posts.

In the stands, groups of alumni stood together wondering if they'd ever be back to Nickerson Field.

"What Silber and those guys don't understand is that you don't have to make a profit on everything," Capehart said. "This is football, a game and these kids' dreams have been broken."

achievement

"This award is not about me, but it is about my players," Rudy said. "You have to have some great players on your team to get this award three times, and I have been blessed with some great players."

All-Conference Selections:

•First team
Erica Iverson — senior defender
Danielle Dion — senior goalie
Sophie Lecot — junior forward
Emma Karowski — sophomore forward
•Second team
Kara Green — freshman forward.

Iverson was named A-10 tournament MVP, and Lecot, Dion and Burrill were named to the all-tournament team.

prepared, maybe we weren't totally prepared."

Perhaps overlooked because of their impressive offensive output was the defense of the Minutewomen, which was powered by senior anchors Ott and Hughes and allowed only one goal in UMass' two tournament games. As the team's center back, Hughes, who had contributed to the offensive and defensive success of the Minutewomen all season, stymied the entire West Chester attack and opened up the Massachusetts offensive with her exceptional play.

"Sharon had an outstanding tournament," Shea said. "She just stopped everything in the middle and shut down their forwards."

After pounding the Temple Owls, 4-0, in the Atlantic 10 tournament semifinal on Saturday with the help of Schmidt's two goals, UMass advanced to the championship game against a Ram team which appeared poised to unseat the Minutewomen for the conference crown, coming off a 5-0 drubbing of La Salle.

Three minutes into the championship contest, West Chester nearly grabbed the momentum on its first penalty-corner attempt; however, a lunging save from UMass' all- tournament goalie, Tucker, set the tone defensively for the Massachusetts squad, which allowed a mere one goal in its two post-season games.

With the victory, the Minutewomen now advance to the NCAA national tournament. UMass is one of three Northeastern region teams which earn automatic bids to the tournament. As the winner of the Big East, Boston College advances to the tourney, as will the America East winner. It is unlikely that all three teams will remain in the area for NCAAs.

All-Stars

Charlton Clarke, leaving the team with only one player with more than one year of experience — junior reserve Ross Burns — dressed for the game. Massachusetts coach Bruiser Flint refused to comment on the status of Weeks and Clarke, who sat out because they violated team rules. Both sat on the bench in street clothes, and are expected to be back for Saturday's exhibition against Marathon Oil.

After being down by as much as 16 early in the first half, Converse — who handed the 35-2 Final Four team a loss during the 1995-1996 pre-season — took over the lead with a furious 25-6 rally, and led 41-36 at the break. Converse pushed the lead to 16, 69-53, when NBA castoff Trevor Ruffin buried a three-pointer with eight minutes left.

From then on the Minutemen, who had begun to wilt under Converse's pressure defense, pulled themselves together for a late surge and the win.

Sophomore forward Chris Kirkland began the run with two straight baskets, and then Mack and junior center Lari Ketner took over. Ketner bullied his way through the double-teaming Converse threw at him all night to help cut the lead to 69-61 with 6:25 left. Mack then dropped a three- pointer with 6:01 left to make it a 69-64 game. With momentum on their side and a crowd of 7,059 behind them, UMass finally tied it at 73-73 on two foul shots by Ketner with less than three minutes left. With the game knotted at 77-77, Converse threw the ball away with 27 seconds left, setting up the winning shot. Mack drove down the left side, freed himself and drilled the game-winner.

"I was just waiting on the wing," said Mack, who scored 15 points on 6-of-16 shooting. "They penetrated, so I went to the corner, just shot the ball and hoped it was going in, which it did."

Keiner led UMass with 18 points and 11 rebounds. Freshman Jonathan DePina, the 5-foot-9 guard who teamed with Mack on South Boston's 1996 state championship team, impressed in his first collegiate game. DePina, perhaps the only true point guard on the team, scored 11 points — nine in the first half — and dished four assists.

As the player whom UMass will look to most often for production, Ketner saw a preview of what he will probably see a lot this year. The junior center, a pre-season All-A-10 selection, was double-teamed all night by a very physical Converse post game.

"Coach told me to expect players to be a lot more physical with me this season. Right now it's a little frustrating because I'm not used to that, usually I'm facing I a one-on-one. This year some teams are focusing in on me, so I have to get used to it."

Kirkland made his case for minutes with nine points and six rebounds, while forward Winston Smith chipped in with five. Sophomore Mike Babul scored two points. According to Flint, all three players, who are fighting for time at small forward, improved in the second half. Ajmal Basit pulled down 10 rebounds to go along with eight points.

Burns played a career-high 19 minutes, and scored five points on two-for-two shooting from the field.

"I'm just happy we won," Flint said. "Guys battled back and didn't quit. But we've got a long way to go."

Horoscopes

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You may find that circumstances have conspired against you today. A change of plans will be necessary if you wish to avoid wasting time.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — Your generosity of spirit can serve you and your companions quite well today. After all, you're working toward a common goal!

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You may not be able to wait until you receive the go–ahead today before you start on a new project. Do not be too aggressive just yet.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — It will be up to you today to past messages on to the right people. Take care that you don't neglect those that are meant for you!

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — You can use the time available to you most creatively today, coming up with some ingenious solutions to a few stubborn problems.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — You are nearing a crossroads, but your attention to detail will serve you well today. Do not forget to give those who are working with you the up–to–date information they need.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — Now is the time to trust your instincts completely. Dealing with a personal challenge will involve more than skill.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — You can have more the advantage, provided you pick up on signals that are sent your way before you are ready to receive them.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — you mustn't neglect duties as you look ahead to what is possible. Focus must be keen today.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You must be playing the waiting game for a while today. Concentrate on preparing for a challenge that is coming your way.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — A repeat performance of sorts can bring you much of the recognition you've been seeking of late. Keep up the good work; look ahead.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — You are in the perfect position to negotiate for greater opportunity, greater compensation, or both. Be tactful at all times.

Massachusetts wins Atlantic–10 championships

Minutewomen squeak by GW, 1-0 UMass wins second straight A–10 title

By Jorma Kansanen

CINCINNATI — Even though the No. 16 Massachusetts women's soccer team's journey to regain the A–10 title ended on Corcoran Field at Xavier, the road to the crown almost always leads through George Washington.

Massachusetts	4
Dayton	0

The two historical rivals battled for conference supremacy once again, and a rivalry etched in the young annals of the A–10 history resumed yesterday afternoon.

The Minutewomen followed up their 1–0 A–10 semifinal win of last season with another close 1–0 win in the A–10 final — close because it took UMass 80:27 to get the winning goal. All-tournament selection Amy Burrill once again set up the game–winner for the Minutewomen, in mirroring her effort on Friday night's 2–0 semi–final win over defending A–10 champion Dayton.

Burrill set a ball down the left flank to freshman Kara Green, and the UMass offensive standout finally stood above the rest. After a match that saw Green get stymied on almost every possession, the GW defense loosened up on the forward at the top of the penalty period, allowing Green to get the shot off. Colonial goalie Traci Jensen could only wave good–bye at the bending, left footed blast from 20 yards out.

Her sixth game–winning goal of the season was by far the biggest, and now the Minutewomen, the automatic bid to the NCAA tournament, are awaiting the time and place for their first–round match–up.

For UMass coach Jim Rudy, his freshman forward's dry spell of late could not have been broken at a better time for Massachusetts.

"This must have been the first left–footed shot she has taken in a week and a half, and it turns out to be a game–winner. Go figure," Rudy said. "We have been working on getting her to use her left foot in practice all week, and she did it at the right time."

"This team really amazes me in what they will do sometimes, and what they won't do sometimes. But one thing I do know, is that they fight to the end, and that's what they did."

For the second consecutive season, the Massachusetts Minutewomen will reign as champions of Atlantic 10 field hockey, after whipping regular–season conference champion West Chester, 3–1, yesterday in the championship game at Richard F. Garber Field.

Temple	0

Although the Golden Rams posted an undefeated conference record during the 1997 campaign, UMass found comfort on its home turf en route to its drubbing of the West Chester squad. As the game's final seconds ticked away, the Minutewomen rushed to the center of the field, celebrating their second–straight A–10 title and NCAA tournament appearance, and their first under a new coach.

Massachusetts	3
West Chester	1

"They did this for themselves," first–year coach Patty Shea said. "When you've had three coaches in three years, you wonder what you are doing wrong. They needed this for themselves."

The UMass offense was sparked by Atlantic 10 tournament MVP Erica Johnston, who exploded for three goals in the contest, as the Minutewomen took complete command of the game early in the second frame. The junior forward notched her first tally of the afternoon off teammate Kate Putnam's deflected pass at 9:36 into the contest. Johnston's other two goals came unassisted in the second period, as she drilled two rebounds past West Chester goalie Heather Vearling.

"Erica is one of the top players in the country," Shea said. "She's a total team player, and she's going to keep getting better and better."

Along with the A–10 scoring leader Johnston, teammates Vicky Brown, Sharon Hughes, Kristen Schmidt, Zowie Tucker and Amy Ott were named to the all–tournament team.

Despite falling to the Golden Rams in the final weekend of regular–season play, the Minutewomen avenged their only divisional loss against a West Chester team that had previously played only two games on AstroTurf the entire season. In addition to the unfamiliar surface, the Rams were slowed by the typhoon–like weather conditions.

"The rain slowed us down a bit, and since we do not play on turf, I thought that would be much to our advantage," West Chester coach Kathy Krannebitter said of her team, which joined the A–10 last season. "This has been a new experience for us. We've been an independent team in the past, and although we were

UMass posts win over Converse All-Stars

By Luke Meredith

After a month of drills, running and scrimmages, the Massachusetts men's basketball team had its first test as a unit Friday night.

And yes, the competition might have last seen a textbook during the Bush administration, but the Converse All–Stars provided these young Minutemen with an early pop quiz on their progress. It was a quiz they passed, with a little of the drama that might prove to be a trademark of this talented young bunch.

First year guard Monty Mack's 15–foot jumper with 2:8 seconds left gave the Minutemen a 79–77 win at the William D. Mullins Center over Converse, a hastily assembled lot of basketball transients, vagabonds and mercenaries that included the likes of Richard Dumas, the out of shape ex–Phoenix Suns forward, and Ted Cottrell, the former UMass forward who has been working in Amherst as a health club manager.

At times, the Minutemen looked like the UMass of lore, and at times fell victim to the age–old trap of inexperience. But in the end they left the floor with a win, and a few things UMass coach Bruiser Flint can take into practice this week.

"We had a lot of guys that had never played before, so you want to see how they react in game type situations," Flint said. "We fought back, we did some good things down the stretch, we got the shots we needed to get, and guys did what they supposed to do... that is what I want to take from this game."

The Minutemen played without the services of senior captain Tyrone Weeks and junior guard

UM second in A–10; Xavier, Rhody top list

PHILADELPHIA — Xavier and Rhode Island are picked as the teams to beat in Atlantic 10 Conference.

In a poll of the league's coaches and media at the league's media day Thursday, Xavier was the choice to win the West Division, with Rhode Island the selection in the East.

Xavier, No. 10 in The Associated Press pre–season rankings, is led by high-scoring guards Lenny Brown and Gary Lumpkin, both all-league selections last season, and James Posey, voted the top sixth man in the conference.

"Most of the starters played a lot of minutes last year, so we're looking for more depth," said coach Skip Prosser, whose 23–6 Musketeers finished first in the West Division last year.

Prosser put little stock in his team's role as division favorite.

"The same guys that picked us to do badly last year picked us to win it this year," he said. "I tell my players to ignore it, that they're clueless. This is a great league — that's not even debatable — and every game will be tough."

Former UCLA coach Jim Harrick is now the coach at Rhode Island and seems to have a team loaded with talent, led by guard Tyson Wheeler, twice an all-league selection. Purdue transfer Luther Clay joins Cuttino Mobley, Angelo Reynolds-Dean and Josh King.

"We've got to get the job done inside," Harrick said. "Wheeler is a terrific point guard who can shoot. He'll be an extension of me on the court."

The Rams are No. 21 in the AP rankings.

Bruiser Flint returns for his second season at UMass (19-14). The outstanding backcourt of Edgar Padilla and Carmelo Travieso has left, but frontcourt stalwarts Lari Ketner and Tyrone Weeks return. "We'll be a little different, but we'll be quicker," Flint said. "We have guys who can score inside, and Charlton Clarke will do a good job running the team."

Temple (20-11) suffered a huge loss when center Marc Jackson turned pro, but the Owls, coached by John Chaney, are always tough. Four starters are back, with Lynn Greer and Quincy Wadley joining Chaney's traditional guard rotation.

"Being without power players is a problem, but the young guards are all quality players," said Chaney, whose team was No. 24 in the pre-season rankings.

St. Joseph's (26-7) was a surprise team last season, winning the league's playoff championship and advancing to the final 16 in the NCAA tournament. Point guard Rashid Bey will lead the Hawks. "In my opinion, Rashid Bey is the best point guard in the nation, but we'll be tiny in the post," Martelli said. Much depends on the academic eligibility of guard Arthur Davis, whose fate will not be known until mid-December.

Boston University fans mourn the loss of its football program

By Corey Peter Goodman
Collegian Staff

BOSTON — Roger Harriott, a sophomore running back at Boston University, is one of the Terriers who won't be playing football next year after the university's decision to drop the program two weeks ago.

Boston Univ	33
Massachusetts	8

Saturday's final home contest against UMass was his chance, and others like him, to say good–bye to the university that betrayed him, and the fans who had supported him and the program for decades.

Harriott didn't waste any time. On the first play from scrimmage, he took the ball the length of the field — 65 yards for the opening score.

Although just a sophomore, Harriott assumed a leadership role on the Terriers this season. Eclipsing the 1,000 yard mark in rushing with his stellar performance Saturday, the rest of the Terriers followed suit, handing UMass one of their worst losses of the season, 33–8.

Harriott's opening run propelled the Terriers to three additional first half touchdowns, which put the Minutemen away early. The Terriers led at halftime, 31–0.

The Terriers opened the second half scoring with a safety by UMass quarterback Anthony Catterton. Pinned inside his five–yard–line, Catterton went back to pass and had the ball knocked out of his hands. A scramble sent the ball out of the back of the endzone off a Minutemen, resulting in the two points awarded to BU.

UMass added a late score when quarterback Jeff Smith found senior Darryl Thomas in the back of the endzone for a touchdown. UMass converted the two–point conversion, accounting for the final score.

The game, however, was drowned in the emotions of the BU players.

While Harriott will likely move on to play football at another school, sophomore Bryant Chisholm may not. As an undersized backup running back, Chisholm has seen limited action this season. Saturday, BU coach Tom Masella gave Chisholm the ball nine times. Chisholm, a local product from Burlington, made the most of his opportunity, scampering for 14 yards.

Junior quarterback Dan Hanafin, who had started only three games all season, gave a memorable effort as well. Hanafin tore apart the Minutemen secondary early for 148 yards and a touchdown.

While BU was pulling off the upset, a driving storm beat down on Nickerson Field. Rain punished the football players, the coaching staffs and most painfully the 3,140 people who trudged through the flooded streets and stood bundled up on cold, slippery metal stands to get a final look at their football team and the storied field they played on.

Gary Capehart was among them, but stood alone.

"A lot of good memories here," he said. "Too many to

Yeltsin talks trade with China

HARBIN, China (AP) — President Boris Yeltsin promoted trade and played up Russia's historic ties with China yesterday, a day after proclaiming their "strategic partnership" during talks with his Chinese counterpart.

Yeltsin and Chinese President Jiang Zemin made boosting economic ties a crucial goal of Monday's summit in Beijing, their fifth. They renewed a goal of $20 billion in annual trade by 2000 and agreed to final demarcation of their 2,500–mile eastern border, where armed clashes occurred as recently as 1969.

Yeltsin traveled yesterday to Harbin, once a bastion of Soviet-built heavy industry and now a center for trade with Russia. He laid a wreath at a memorial for Soviet troops killed in the region, known as Manchuria, in the last days of World War II. Two dozen ethnic Russians, many the offspring of people who fled the Soviet revolution, cheered and waved at Yeltsin.

During their summit, Yeltsin and Jiang played up the warming relations between their two countries, insisting they were aimed at promoting world peace and prosperity, not at reviving the communist alliance of the 1950s.

Clinton urges NATO enlargement

ARLINGTON, Va. (AP) — One good way for the nation to honor the men and women who fought its wars is by enlarging NATO to help assure peace in Europe, President Clinton said yesterday in marking Veterans Day.

In his remarks, at Arlington National Cemetery, the president urged the Senate to approve an expansion of the Western alliance to include Poland, Hungary and the Czech Republic.

He said he hoped senators would "remember the lessons our veterans have taught us — that Europe's security is vital to our own, that allying with Europe's democracy is our best sword and shield and that it is far, far better to prevent wars than to wage them."

Clinton placed a wreath of red, white and blue flowers at the Tomb of the Unknowns before the playing of "Taps."

In a reference to the current crisis involving Iraq, he decried what he said were that nation's efforts to build "weapons of mass destruction."

At the Vietnam Veterans Memorial, Clinton's drug policy adviser said Americans should reach out to Vietnam veterans, many of whom continue to suffer from drug abuse and alcoholism.

Retired Gen. Barry McCaffrey, a Vietnam and Gulf War Army veteran, said at least 80,000 Vietnam veterans still suffer from severe service-connected disabilities. Around 6 percent suffer from drug dependence and an additional 11 percent from alcoholism, McCaffrey said.

Acquaintance rapes reported to UM police

Over the past two weeks, three women from the University of Massachusetts have reported acquaintance rapes to the campus police department.

According to the police logs, two of these alleged rapes occurred in Southwest residential halls and the other occurred in an Orchard Hill residential hall.

These alleged separate incidents were reported to have occurred on Oct. 19, Oct. 14 and Oct. 21. The women reported the incidents to the police Oct. 24, Nov. 4 and Nov. 6, respectively.

Deputy Chief Barbara O'Connor, refused to comment on the cases due to pending investigation and confidentiality, however she said although three reports of acquaintance rape in two weeks is alarming to the police department, she feels many cases go unreported.

In addition she said, "many times a rape occurs and it isn't reported for a week, a month or even a lot longer."

Police Chief Jack Luippold could not be reached for comment.

Anyone who has been a victim of a sexual assault may report these incidence to the police department at 545–2677, mental health at 545–2337, and Everywoman's Center at 545-0883 or their 24–hour hotline 545–0800.

GEO and administration are closer to compromise after recent negotiations

By Julie Siegal
Collegian Staff

The Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) and the University of Massachusetts administration conducted contract negotiations last Friday, with both parties emerging from the meeting "more optimistic" and closer to compromise than ever before.

"It's fair to say that the GEO reps and the administration reps left the meeting more optimistic than we've been in a very long time," Associate Chancellor Susan Pearson said.

Although neither party could elaborate on Friday's discussion, Pearson said a new contract should be written by the end of the semester if things continue as planned.

Both the administration and GEO said each party's efforts is what finally sparked some agreement between the two sides.

"Friday was a significant bargaining session because the administration moved closer to our proposal than they have in over a year," said Jennifer Fasulo, GEO Vice-President. "We think it's clearly a response to the mobilization we've done and the upcoming momentum from the teach-in."

The administration, however, said GEO's mobilization efforts through their letter-writing campaign, in which various academic departments brought letters to Chancellor David K. Scott expressing their concerns over the lengthy negotiations, had no influence in bringing the two sides closer to agreement.

"For the first time, GEO expressed willingness to consider the possibility [of the administration's proposals]," Pearson said, but the letter-writing campaign didn't "make any particular difference" to the administration, she continued.

GEO's previous contract expired 15 months ago and they have been bargaining for a new contract for 20 months. The four main issues they are proposing in their new contract are increased wages, affordable and flexible childcare, additional health care options and affirmative action.

During their 15 months without a new contract, GEO has been unable to receive stipend increases, a problem attributed to Massachusetts state government, according to Pearson. The University has to receive authorization from the state before giving stipend increases to the graduate employees, Pearson said. The administration acquired approval from the state on Sept. 16.

As for the argument that GEOs wages are relatively lower than those at other large state universities, Pearson said the Office of Employee Relations which is operated by the state, is the determining factor of graduate employees' salaries.

"The university doesn't control the size of the package, but we have to pay

Amherst parking garage receives support from students and locals

By Paul Hayes
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — A number of University of Massachusetts students who were asked whether they felt a parking garage should be constructed at Boltwood Walk in Amherst center agreed with senior psychology and legal studies major Mike O'Neil when he said, "Build one, 'cause there's no parking in downtown Amherst and it pisses me off."

O'Neil, who goes to the center on a daily basis to get food and conduct errands, said that a parking garage would allow customers increased access to downtown area businesses.

You often drive by an open spot, and by the time you turn around it's already taken, said sophomore biochemistry and molecular biology major Marcus Teixeira.

"[Building a parking garage] is for the well being of all of Amherst, not just UMass," Teixeira said.

A parking garage may not only improve the public's access to Amherst center, but could also aid center area employees and residents.

Julia Gould, a former Pub and current Judie's employee, said that during heavy business days, such as Saturday, she has had to park up to a half–mile away from her work.

The parking lot behind Judie's where employees park can fill up on the weekends, thus forcing employees out onto Main Street, Gould said.

Former Black Sheep employee Abby Ferrier, said that parking in Amherst at certain times of the day and the year can be a real hassle.

Ferrier said that taking the bus to work would be a logical solution to the parking problem, but that it's not always convenient.

"If you work in town, the most convenient thing to do is to take the PVTA bus," Ferrier said. "But not everyone can add an extra half hour to their schedules."

A parking garage could remedy this situation by providing assured parking spaces to center area workers for flat monthly rates.

A parking space costs $50 a month at the Northampton parking garage, said Ferrier.

According to Ferrier, having a reserved parking space offered convenience, and a reduction in parking tickets.

Whether or not students could afford to pay the cost of a parking space is another story.

"I'd be willing to spend money on a reserved space," Gould said, "But I don't know if I could afford it."

Yet, at least one Amherst center employee did not have a problem with the center's parking situation.

"I'd park [in the parking lot] behind CVS about 70 percent of the time when I went to work, I didn't mind," said former Pinnochio's waiter and senior mechanical engineering major Carlos Rodriguez.

Rodriguez said that while a parking

Parking issue on Meeting agenda

AMHERST — The question of whether or not a parking garage will be built at Boltwood Walk is coming closer to being answered.

Discussion on the parking garage will resume when the Amherst Town Meeting reconvenes tonight at the Amherst Regional Middle School at 7:30 p.m.

There are currently two plans being considered for the proposed parking garage, one by architect Peter Kitchell, and another by the Meyer and Meyer architectural firm.

The Kitchell plan will have 215 parking spaces, and consists of an underground garage and a redeveloped ground level parking area.

Kitchell's plan preserves Boltwood Walk as a shortcut between Main Street and Kellogg Street, and proponents say it preserves the area as open space, allows for pedestrian access, and fits the town's

English au pair seeks vindication

By Erica Noonan
Associated Press

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. — Louise Woodward yesterday pronounced herself "enormously relieved" that a judge allowed her to go free, but still would seek total exoneration in the death of an 8-month-old boy whom she said she loved.

In her first public comment since Judge Hiller Zobel's decision Monday to reduce her conviction to manslaughter, the 19-year-old former au pair also said she did not plan to sell her story to the news media.

Zobel on Monday sentenced Woodward to the 279 days she served in prison since her arrest Feb. 5 and ordered her released to bring a "compassionate conclusion" to the case. The baby, Matthew Eappen, was taken to a hospital Feb. 4, suffering from a brain injury, and died five days later.

"I am enormously relieved that Judge Zobel has seen fit to give me back my liberty," Woodward said in a statement released through her attorneys.

"My relief at being freed does not reduce my desire to obtain total vindication in a case where, as I have said under oath, I committed no crime whatsoever.

"I loved Matthew," she said. "I know that his family is unable to understand or believe me, because they are so convinced that I killed him or at least contributed to his death."

She said she hoped further investigation would eventually convince the Eappen family of her innocence.

Woodward, who was secluded with her parents, said she would say nothing else until further legal proceedings end.

While turning her loose, Zobel barred the English-born teen from leaving the state until a court says so, and the appeal of her

Elvia Alvarado speaks about human rights for Hondurans

By Sarah J. Kimmel
Collegian Staff

Honduran human rights leader Elvia Alvarado spoke in the Campus Center on Monday evening as part of the Latin American Lecture Series sponsored by the Office of ALANA (Asian, Latino, African, and Native American) Affairs.

Alvarado is a peasant leader in Honduras who has struggled for 25 years to achieve equal treatment for the people in Honduras. Alvarado, who began her fight as a social activist through the Catholic Church, organized women in the countryside to distribute food to malnourished children. She went on to become a founder of the Federation of Campesina Women (FEHMUC). This union–like organization created women's cooperatives in rural Honduras.

Alvarado is also the author of the best–selling book, Don't Be Afraid Gringo, and is the subject of the PBS documentary entitled, Elvia and the Fight for Land of Liberty.

Honduras, the poorest country in Central America, suffers from a great division of classes. Those who work on the vast farmland do not own land of their own. These peasant workers are employed by imperialist companies who pay them such low wages that they can barely afford food, work them long hours and abuse them with beatings and severe punishments. Money is so hard to come by that these workers migrate to where the work is so that they can afford to feed their families.

Alvarado described the conditions that the Campesinos endure.

"These are hospitals but no medical attention for us. We have the right to an education, but no support of any sort. The average Campesina only finishes the second grade. The women in the mountains are so malnourished that they are dying," Alvarado said.

It is the Campesina, the women, who are treated the poorest, according to Alvarado.

"The Campesina suffer the most because she is submissive and marginalized by the man. She is forced to work in the fields with her husband, as well as care for the house and travel to the market to buy and sell fruit," she said.

It is not only the rich city man who mistreats these working women, but also the Campesino men who try to oppress the Campesinas.

"Men in Honduras are completely machismo. They don't like for us [the women] to organize," Alvarado said. "They are only starting to see now that only through organization can we progress."

These peasant workers, or Campesinos, help to produce billions of dollars worth of sugar cane, rice, corn, beans and textiles from that land, yet they do not have enough food to feed their families. Alvarado said that "treatment of the work force is terrible... as long as this land is taken we suffer from hunger and poverty. All that we suffer in our small countries and the blame goes to the United States." It is not the people of the United States that she is blaming for the poverty of the Campesinos, rather the American government, whose treaties and businesses effect the Honduran people. Alvarado said that these companies "exploit the workers and are getting rich off the work of the Campesinos."

Alvarado described similar situations to that in Honduras., "Nicaragua and El Salvador were pushed into war because the United States wants them to be in war so that they are divided and this is in their [the U.S.] own interest," Alvarado said. "These are the policies of the powerful."

Amherst cops win Blue Bowl

By Roderick Oreste
Collegian Correspondent

AMHERST — Amidst the cold and rainy weather, the Amherst and University of Massachusetts police came out to battle each other in a flag football game at the Mullins Center field for charity. The Third Annual Amherst Blue Bowl took place Sunday to benefit the North Valley Area Special Olympics.

Special Olympics Area Manager Garrett Deane plans to use the funds from the Blue Bowl for this year's winter programs. The Special Olympics hold year-round programs in competition and sports training.

"Our winter sports include floor hockey, figure skating, downhill, alpine and nordic skiing," Deane said. "This is our single biggest fundraiser of the year. It's an important deal. The first year we raised about $1,200 and $1,800 in the second year. This year we hope to raise over $2,000."

The estimated funds raised for yesterday's Blue Bowl was about $3,000.

In cooperation with the Amherst and University of Massachusetts police departments, the coordinators for the event were Deane and Mike Schultz. Schultz, a UMass graduate student, has been a volunteer for the Special Olympics for two years.

"The North Valley Special Olympics are always looking for volunteers for our programs," Schultz said. "Most of the volunteer opportunities lie in coaching, fundraising, and tournament coordinating."

One of the ultimate goals of the Blue Bowl is to find a UMass organization to coordinate and run the event.

"Last year, the service fraternity Alpha Phi Omega organized the event," Deane said. The premiere sponsor for the annual Blue Bowl event is the First Massachusetts Bank.

Most of the tickets are sold and bought by the Amherst and UMass Police Departments and their families. Along with bragging rights, the winner of the game is awarded the Blue Bowl trophy and keeps it on display in their police department until the next year.

The Amherst Police Department won the first two Blue Bowls, while the UMass police are still looking for their first victory.

The Amherst police came on strong early in the first half scoring two touchdowns early, off of two interceptions. UMass could not generate the offense for a comeback, finally losing 21-0. The Amherst police extended their two year reign of the Blue Bowl to three.

The two police departments got together at Seven-Os in Sunderland after the game. The families and friends of each police department came out to support the players and the cause regardless of the weather.

The North Valley Special Olympics are based out of Hadley. For more information on volunteering, contact Garrett Deane at (413)584-9377.

garage would help center area employees find a parking space, it wouldn't be worth it to him to buy a monthly parking space.

Ferrier said that center area residents have a hard time finding parking, and that a garage could benefit them as well.

Many students favor the smaller of the two parking garage designs currently before the Amherst Town Meeting.

One design, by architect Peter Kitchell, provides 215 parking spaces and is made up of a below ground garage and a reconfigured and landscaped ground level parking area.

The other design is a larger multi-deck garage designed by the Meyer and Meyer architectural firm, which would provide 292 parking spaces.

A larger garage would not be productive, because not that many people come into Amherst, Teixeira said.

"It would be a waste of money to build a large garage that's never full," Teixeira said.

While Amherst is not getting any smaller, the city should spend the time and money in having the garage fit Amherst's landscape and architecture, Farrier said.

"I'm opposed to a big gray structure, like the one at UMass, which is a pretty ugly parking garage," Farrier said. "I'd like it to be built with thought and consideration for the town."

The town doesn't need that much more parking to justify the building of a multi-deck garage, O'Neil said.

"I think a larger garage would go underused," O'Neil said.

Some students were concerned about possible adverse affects to local businesses as a result of a larger parking garage.

"I don't want to see local businesses run out by bigger stores with bigger names," Teixeira said. "It's nice to have the choice to go to local places like Judie's instead of commercial places."

Other students said that they would rather have more business come to the center.

"They have Mickey Mouse stores uptown, the best ones are CVS and Newbury Comics," said freshman economy major Matt Dembro.

Dembro said that he supposed the local shops in the center added charm in a Rockport sort of way, but he was not all that impressed.

"You only need so many arts and crafts stores and bookstores," Dembro said.

manslaughter conviction could take two years. Her lawyers and friends, meanwhile, were mulling a bid to have her declared innocent of killing Matthew.

For now, at least, Woodward is free to do what she wants for the first time in more than nine months.

She is free "to walk to the end of the corner, to turn in the direction she wants to turn, to cross a street, to catch a bus, to buy a Coke, just to be a free person," said defense attorney Elaine Whitfield Sharp.

Two national polls released today indicate a split opinion about the sentence, which was far shorter than the 40 to 60 months included in state guidelines.

Polls by ABC News and USA Today/CNN found a majority of those surveyed — 56 percent on the ABC poll and 52 percent for USA Today/CNN — agreed with the judge's decision to reduce the murder conviction. However, 49 percent in the ABC poll and 52 percent in the USA Today/CNN poll thought she deserved to spend more time behind bars.

The ruling angered Drs. Sunil and Deborah Eappen, who came under widespread criticism for entrusting Matthew and his brother, Brendan, now 3, to a $115-a-week au pair — a young person who comes to the United States on a cultural exchange — instead of a more expensive and highly trained nanny.

"What is Judge Zobel thinking? What does that say about justice? Does it say that you can kill a baby, and that your youth and inexperience with cranky babies counts for more than a child's life?" Mrs. Eappen told The Boston Globe.

Eappen said he wondered how Zobel could find Woodward guilty of manslaughter, but set her free.

"What if Matthew had been his grandson?" Eappen asked. "Doesn't he get it? Someone killed Matthew. He acknowledges on the one hand that someone killed Matthew, and on the other hand he frees her. It makes no sense."

The televised trial grabbed the attention of millions in this country and in England, where Woodward lives. It generated sharp criticism of America's legal system and raised questions about how working parents can find safe child care.

For Woodward's supporters, the decisions to reduce her conviction from second-degree murder to involuntary manslaughter and order her release amounted to absolution.

"Justice has been done," said Patrick McGibbern, one of many who hugged and cheered amid Woodward innocent, said she had been "a little rough" with Matthew, causing his skull fracture. But Zobel said she had not acted with malice, an element required to reach the murder conviction.

Supporters of the Kitchell plan include a number of Amherst residents and the Town Finance Committee.

Opponents to the Kitchell plan say that a larger garage would better help Amherst center business, and that the pedestrian and drive-thru access could create traffic and result in a number of accidents.

The Meyer and Meyer plan will have 292 parking spaces, and consists of a multi-deck garage which would be expandable if parking needs increase in the future.

Proponents of the Meyer plan say that it will assist Amherst center businesses, bolster the local economy and provide center area employees and residents with assured parking.

Supporters of the Meyer plan include many center area businesses and the Town Select Board.

Opponents to the Meyer plan say that such a large garage is unnecessary, and would not pay for itself, and that it is an ugly structure which does not fit the aesthetics of the town of Amherst.

The parking garage is thought to be necessary because of a deficit of parking spaces in Amherst center, a deficit which has been hotly contested.

There are some who argue that no parking garage is needed, and say that better management of the current parking system in addition to people parking in available spots further from their destinations would solve Amherst parking problems.

There is a chance no garage could be built, if neither plan receives enough votes. In such a case then the plans could go to a town vote for a last chance of approval.

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

Elvia Alvarado, a Honduran peasant-worker for 25 years, spoke about her struggle for civil rights in her home country.

rights leader through the Catholic Church, that same church no longer assists the Campesinos in their fight.

"The church had already shown us the way to get our rights. That's when there were great massacres. Some church officials tried to help us but they were murdered. The church now is different, it has declined," Alvarado said. "When the pope comes to Honduras he talks to the president and the military prior to talking with the church or the people."

In response to this mistreatment by the companies and government in Honduras, Alvarado has been touring the United States to make the U.S. people aware of her plight. She discussed a boycott of the products that are being produced at the expense of the Honduran peasant worker.

In addition, the Campesinos have been asking those companies to withdraw from the land and to leave the Honduran people room to prosper.

"If these tactics do not work, we will take the land we need by force," Alvarado said.

The Peace Corp is another example of the split of the classes that is encouraged by the U.S. government, according to Alvarado.

"They [the U.S. government] say those organizations will help the Honduran people but that's not true," said Alvarado. "These organizations, like the Peace Corp, are coordinated by the government and work only for the bourgeoisie. The politicians manipulate them for their own political agendas. We poor receive nothing from these organizations. In my 25 years struggling for land not one Peace Corps worker has come to me."

For her constant fight for civil rights, Alvarado has been jailed, beaten and starved. She told a story of how she was kept in a Honduran jail for 25 days without food or water. Her cell was filled with water and she recalled having a pistol held to her head.

"I had nothing to eat or drink and I could not see the sun. I have holes in my back where I was beaten, when they found me I could not even stand up. They called me a communist and a guerilla, if that's what it means to stand up for what is right, then OK. I am a communist and a guerilla. I would give my life for my people," she said.

In her closing statement she pleaded with the North American people to join her struggle. "The people united will never be defeated," Alvarado said.

U.S. asks Security Council for help

By Robert H. Reid
Associated Press

UNITED NATIONS — Declaring that Iraqi defiance has reunited the Gulf War coalition, U.S. and British diplomats asked the Security Council yesterday to slap a travel ban on Iraq and warn of "further measures" unless it cooperates with U.N. arms inspectors.

But the resolution did not include the threat of military force should Iraq continue refusing to rescind its Oct. 29 order to expel American members of the U.N. weapons inspection team.

The draft also omitted a warning of "serious consequences" because of opposition from the French and Russians.

British Deputy Ambassador Stephen Somersall said he would formally submit a U.S.-British draft resolution to the 15-member council in hopes a vote could be taken today.

The resolution would ban Iraqi officials who interfere with U.N. inspectors from traveling abroad, condemn Iraq for its expulsion of American inspectors and suspend further reviews of economic sanctions until the inspectors certify that Baghdad is cooperating. U.S. Ambassador Bill Richardson said he was optimistic for a 15-0 vote.

"The coalition has reunited itself because of Iraqi behavior," Richardson said. "We believe that there's strong unanimity and consensus on the council that Iraq's behavior has been unacceptable."

Richardson admitted there were "some wrinkles" that needed to be worked out with the French and Russians. He did not elaborate. But council diplomats said the French raised questions about the timetable for reviewing the state of Iraqi compliance.

Threats of force were deleted from the resolution in hopes of winning support from Russia, France, China and other nations anxious to resume lucrative trade links with Iraq once sanctions are lifted.

U.S. and British diplomats said they were willing to accept a weaker resolution in hopes of winning council unanimity. Iraq issued its expulsion order after five members — France, Russia, China, Egypt and Kenya — abstained on a resolution last month threatening a travel ban.

U.S. and British diplomats believe Iraq President Saddam Hussein saw the abstentions as a sign of divisions on the council and sought to exploit them by moving against the American inspectors. Iraq's deputy prime minister, Tariq Aziz, admitted yesterday that his efforts to fend off council action had failed. Aziz flew to New York on Monday to press Iraq's demand that the United Nations agree to reduce the percentage of Americans on the inspection team, stop U.S.-manned U-2 spy flights and provide a timetable for the end of sanctions.

After meeting with council President Qin Huasun of China, Aziz said he had not received any promises of change in the council's position.

"For if you don't have a change in the position of the Security Council, you cannot expect a change on the position of Iraq," Aziz said.

Aziz has met privately with ambassadors of France, China and Russia, the permanent council members most sympathetic to Baghdad. Diplomatic sources said the envoys told him they could do little to argue Iraq's case as long as Baghdad defied U.N. orders. For the eighth time in nine days, Iraq banned an inspection team yesterday because it included Americans.

for it," Pearson said. Until GEO and the administration conclude contract negotiations, GEO said they will continue the letter-writing campaign and will hold demonstrations to highlight the issues of their contract campaign.

GEO is leading a labor action/teach-in tomorrow and Friday, in which they are asking teaching assistants to vacate their normally occupied classrooms and move their classes to a visible space in the Student Union or Campus Center. Over 200 sections or approximately 4,000 students, are planning to take part in the teach-in, Pearson said.

The Cape Cod Lounge and Student Union Ballroom are two of the spaces reserved for the teach-in, but those spaces will still be available to other students who normally occupy those areas throughout the day. A number of registered student organizations (RSOs) have also agreed to loan their offices to GEO for the teach-in.

At noon on Friday, a rally will be held on the steps of the Student Union where, after the rally, participants will march GEOs bargaining team into negotiations at the Whitmore Administration building. GEO said they expect a big turnout for the rally and are excited about their upcoming events.

"There's a feeling of real excitement and empowerment by the people in the union and the recognition that we have the capacity to fight for what we deserve," Fasulo said. "We don't have to settle for the crumbs the university has thrown us in the past."

The Demon Rum

"Man, thy Children are dying of an horrid poison in their Bowels; and it was thou that poison'd them." — Cotton Mather

There is no mystery about the identity of the chief villain in the twisted cosmology of the neo-Puritans, whose neurotic crusade to save us from ourselves is becoming increasingly annoying.

This disciple of Lucifer and corrupter of youth goes by these names — Johnny Walker, Jack Daniels, Jim Beam, Old Grandad, Yukon Jack — I refer of course to that old reprobate, the "Demon Rum."

The neo-prohibitionists, like their Puritan ancestor Cotton Mather, put the blame squarely on society for tolerating intoxication and not disciplining the wretched drinkers who gulp down draughts of purest evil in orgiastic frenzies by night and then puke their souls out in endless mornings of remorse and regret.

"Binge drinking is normalized in our environment," they moan. By "binge drinking," one of their favorite catch phrases, these latter-day Carrie Nations mean five beers in an evening for men, and only four for the poor ladies. If that's a "binge," then I'm a Latvian herring tycoon.

What this sort of rhetoric declares is that the enemy isn't alcohol as used, for example, in the Communion ceremony or as a refined accompaniment to haute cuisine. The enemy is intoxication, inebriation, vile indulgence and pleasure, the devil's playground.

No wonder the aptly named Pete's Wicked Red has just issued a set of occult tarot card coasters. Everything they told you about the Rolling Rock bottles — all true.

Authorities are scrambling to respond to the hatchet-wielding harridans of abstinence with the predictable draconian prohibitions, fighting to see who can be more alcohol free. The proposed campus-wide alcohol ban, a sickeningly logical corollary to the existing campus-wide smoking ban, is a clear case in point.

Amherst has gone, in a few short years, from being one of the few towns civilized and relaxed enough not to have a pointless law against public consumption of alcohol to a place where the authorities seem to anticipate civil unrest every weekend outside Antonio's.

Try walking uptown on a Friday evening, and take a look at the barricades manned by sheepish-looking and embarrassed police officers who are clearly aware of the absurdity of the over-reaction. It's a scene out of Allende's Chile. All they need is a couple of tanks to complete the picture.

War Against Liberty & Pleasure

Hussein Ibish

Worst of all, the stormtroopers of the Alcoholic Beverage Commission (ABC) have shut down the only really enjoyable bar in Amherst, Time Out, on trumped-up charges. Time Out was, above all, the only pub in town that was always fundamentally about drinking rather than anything else. As such, it was a gem.

That its closure is a terrible blow to Amherst grows increasingly clear, since there is no equivalent. We have lost something of real value in this case to the chicken-littles of the neo-Puritan movement.

Of course, like many of life's most profound elements, alcohol can be dangerous. That's why we don't give it to children or allow people to drive while drunk, and impose some other reasonable controls on its use.

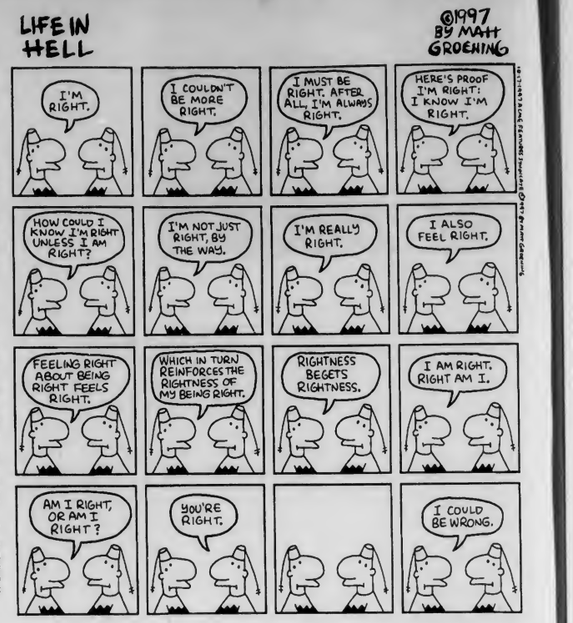
But what the neo-prohibitionists argue is that intoxication in and of itself is bad, and that the use of alcohol as a mind-altering substance is wicked and sinful.

"Drinking," Sally Damon of University Health Services warns us grimly, "is fun?" (Gasp, shudder).

So, with this extended exercise in binge stupidity, out goes that vast aesthetic, philosophical and spiritual legacy of human civilization which is tied to intoxication in general and alcohol in particular.

Those who would dismiss alcohol consumption as merely dangerous, frivolous or escapist miss, as usual, the broader significance of the use of transcendent substances.

David Lenson notes alcohol's "refusal to press the dialectic to synthesis," which permits "holding contraries in an eternal balance [that Keats called] 'negative capability.'" As a result, he concludes, "alcohol is a drug of unending quest, whose principle affect is a longing too divine to be satisfied."



Perhaps this is why alcohol has repeatedly suggested itself as an answer to the endless displacements and dislocations of modernity, and the resulting sense of Time and History as unbearable burdens on the modern subjectivity.

Redemption through intoxication is modernism's earliest and, perhaps, most important lesson.

As the first great modernist, Charles Baudelaire, explained:

"Il faut être toujours ivre. Tout est là: c'est l'unique question. Mais de quoi? De vin, de poésie ou de vertu, à votre guise. Mais enivrez-vous." [We must always be drunk. That's all there is to it: the only choice. On what? Wine, poetry, virtue, whatever you like. Just get drunk.]

Sale today: California

The other day, I was just sitting around, nothing to do.

And then it came to me — I could solve our country's trillion dollar deficit.

Cool.

My plan is very simple: we'll hold a great big auction — preferably somewhere neutral, like Switzerland. We'll get an enthusiastic auctioneer like the Micro Machines' announcer guy and we'll sell off one of our states.

The way I see it, we've got 50 states and several assorted territories. We can easily spare a state or two. Not only will we be unloading a state that contributes little to our nation, we will also be solving the deficit, and pushing the debt onto some other poor sucker of a country.

So without prejudice, I've picked out five states I think we can all do without.

California — California's a great a place to get a tan; unfortunately it's also one of the most dangerous places to live in this country. Riots and other violent acts aside, Californians also have to deal with mud slides, earthquakes, forest fires, droughts and Sonny Bono.

Given the likely chance that California eventually is going to drop into the Pacific in the next thousand years or so, why spend any more money on it? Just cut our losses and send California packing.

Maine — As a state, Maine is absolutely gorgeous — a haven for lobster lovers. There's some nice beaches up there, an L.L. Bean outlet or two, and Arcadia Park.

Unfortunately, there's not much else going for Maine and I'm sure Canada would love the extra space to expand into. And being at the edge of the United States, Maine could easily be given up to another country.

Seema Gangatirkar

Florida — Sure, Florida just smacks of nutrition with all that orange juice they keep pushing at us. But if you think about it, how much do we really need Florida?

You have to give Florida credit; any new crime wave starts down there. Figure out a new way to break into the neighborhood bakery? Got to do it in Florida first, with "20/20" watching.

And as a retirement state and a cultural oasis for expatriate and exiled Cubans, Florida isn't all that bad.

But again, do we really need Florida? The way I see it, we can invest a bunch of money from the defense budget and send the Pentagon down there to surgically remove Florida (maybe with the help of an excess nuclear weapon or two) and float it out to sea. I'm sure Cuba would give us a grunt load of money for the opportunity to own Florida.

It's a neat picture: Castro making his own orange juice.

Texas — Given the fact that you can drive nine hours and still be in Texas, I make a motion to sell Texas back to Mexico.

Selling Texas back to Mexico would be a great public relations coup for the United States. First, we would acknowledge our mistake for bullying Mexico in the first place and stealing Texas, so now we would look like the good guys. Second, Texas doesn't really want to be part of the United States anyway — they still call themselves a republic. God knows whether Texas wants to be a part of Mexico, but that would be Mexico's headache instead of ours. I mean, think about it, how many states have the motto if at first you don't secede, try, try again?

Rhode Island — First of all, this is a state that isn't really an island. I mean, it's a little, odd sliver of land with a pretty good view of the Atlantic. It's also a state which didn't even have the guts to sign the Constitution until everyone else did. It's also very crowded in Rhode Island and your guess is as good as mine why people actually live there. And other than contributing really smart people via Brown University, what does Rhode Island lend to the United States?

So there you have it — the first five states to hit the auction block. There are others I could have mentioned like New Jersey, Montana, Utah and Ohio. But never you fear, if your state is one of the first five up; I guarantee you that this auction would be such a success, the government could hold one every other year.

It could be quite the field day for other countries looking to expand their territories. Imagine Liechtenstein doubling its land area with the simple acquisition of Rhode Island.

We'd look good, other countries would feel good. Best of all, we wouldn't have to worry about our deficit anymore. A simple solution to a difficult problem.

Letters to the Editor

Education is not a business

To the Editor:

It is not surprising that James Carlin finds this country's educational system "dysfunctional." The chairman of the state Board of Higher Education is, after all, first and foremost a man of business. To people concerned more with education than profit, however, such a focus on management and the bottom line is more than a little troubling.

Carlin is right that universities are not run as businesses. Learning and academic study are not "products" to be bought and sold. It is impossible to put a price on the academic development of young people, or on the research needed to make scientific advances. Carlin is confused on exactly the issue of "accountability" that he feels is lacking: the standards for judging professors exist, but they are vastly different from those evaluating businesses.

Professors who excel are granted tenure. This is not some sort of scam to shelter sub-par academics, but rather an essential element for the successful advancement of bodies of knowledge. One must assume that Carlin would put in its place a system based on a business model. Under this system, professors would be subject to the indifferent forces of the market. In other words, professors would be ousted once they voiced opinions unpopular to supervisors.

As 2,600 graduate employees continuing to fight for a new contract, we understand acutely the need for job security within the University system. The absence of guarantees which would provide teachers academic freedom would be an incredibly disruptive facet of academic life, one that would be detrimental to all concerned with the future of higher education.

Chabad hires program director

By Bryan Schwartzman
Collegian Staff

In her new post as Chabad House Program Director, Eliana Ward, a 1991 Smith College graduate has returned to the Five College area to help create more religious, cultural, and social options for people in the Jewish community.

At the Chabad House of Amherst, where Ward also lives, her job involves being an emissary to the community and working with students, including the Chabad House Students Coalition, a registered student organization.

"Chabad House is a warm and accepting environment. It is completely non-judgmental and is a warm and pleasant place to learn," said Ward.

Ward, an African-American who converted from Christianity, appreciates this friendly environment. Originally from Long Island, N.Y., Ward's return to the Pioneer Valley is another step in her lifelong spiritual journey and fascination with Judaism.

"The first time I stepped into a synagogue, I knew I was in the right place," Ward said of the time she spent the Sabbath with a Jewish friend in grade school.

She continued to explore Judaism until her graduation from Smith, when she decided to seek a conversion. A self- described feminist, she surprised herself when she began to consider Orthodox Judaism.

"I had a lot of misconceptions about Orthodox Judaism," she said.

After college, she was living in New York and was looking for a place to celebrate the high holidays. She decided to attend the Chabad-Lubavitch synagogue in Crown Heights. Instead of feeling uncomfortable because of her religion and race, the rabbi and congregation created an environment to explore Judaism, she said.

The fact that the congregation had a woman rabbi helped Ward feel more at home and conjured the sense of awe that she felt about Judaism as a child. She decided to seek a conversion.

"Conversion is a difficult process," she said. "It required a degree of introspection a lot of people won't face.

"I agree with that stance to accept Judaism fully is what conversion is about," she said in reference to the Israeli government's decision to accept only Orthodox conversions in Israel (but accepting Conservative and Reform conversions performed abroad).

A convert should accept all Mitvot: keep kosher, keep Sabbath, make a commitment to live one's life according to Jewish law, something not all born Jews do, she said.

Her parents and friends and community, have been very supportive of what she said was the biggest decision of her life, she said.

When traveling, she is not only on the lookout for racist attitudes, she is also conscious of anti-Semitism. She has traveled to France, Italy, and England but said the most anti- Semitic, and anti-black, city she has ever been to is right in our own back yard, Boston.

Ward returned to the Five College area this fall to replace her predecessor Yonnah Blum, who was recently married.

"One of the reason's I came back [to the Five College area] is that the options of Jewish students were fairly limited," said Ward.

"I wanted to come back and make a difference," she said.

"She's pretty popular [with students], she's been in the area before, and of course her Judaism is quite amazing," said Chaim Adelman, who is in his 10th year as rabbi of the Chabad House.

Addleman said Chabad's financial resources are family limited, so they usually look to hire unmarried students in rabbinical school. Ward is not a rabbinical student, but is seeking a masters in psycho-analytical studies. She is a part- time employee.

Chabad is an acronym for three Hebrew words, Chochmah, binah, and Daa'at, which are translated as wisdom, understanding and knowledge. Chabad House at Amherst has been in the Pioneer Valley since 1974, and is a part of the world-wide Chabad-Lubavitch movement, under the leadership of the Labavitcher Rebbe, M'HM Shilo.

On Nov. 16, Ward will be taking a group of students to Crown Heights, to visit the main Lubavitch synagogue, 770.

"This trip will normalize what goes on [in this environment] as well as explore historical buildings," Ward said.

Students interested in going to New York should call the Chabad House at 549-4094.

Students have another option with JLC

By Morgan Tobor
Collegian Correspondent

The University Of Massachusetts Hillel House provides an alternative living area for its Jewish community members.

Located on the second floor of the Hillel House is the University's- own Jewish Living Community (JLC).

"There can't be a better spot at UMass to live than ex actly halfway between uptown Amherst and campus," Jon Unger, a senior exercise science major, said.

The JLC is for UMass students, but not exclusively. All Five College students are welcome, said Jason Hill the Residential Assistant of the JLC.

The JLC is currently excepting applications for the spring semester. Applications can be turned into the Hillel House and interviews will be set up on arrival. Placement is on a first come, first serve basis.

There are 13 rooms with the capacity for 26 residents. This semester there are 19 residents, said Hill.

There are a few requirements for living in the JLC. First, a student must be Jewish. This is not to discriminate, but to ensure the sense of community, said Hill. Second, a student must be willing to be an active member of the community, and third, a student must be at least a sophomore.

In order to live in the JLC a student does not need to be extremely religious. Religious beliefs vary, as do majors and talents. There is a wide variety of majors anywhere from chemical engineering, marketing, nursing and music to folklore and Greek mythology.

Residents say the JLC has many different attributes to make it feel more like home and provide a true sense of community.

"The rooms at the JLC are very spacious and there are fewer people than in the dorms. This is helpful in doing your homework," said junior Josh Sanofsky.

The JLC has a 24-hour respect policy, rather than certain declared quite hours.

"It's like my home away from home. It has a friendly atmosphere" said Lisa Brenner, a senior legal studies major.

Weekly floor meetings are held to discuss upcoming events or simply talk about how all members are doing. Upcoming events include activities such as attending plays together, weekend retreats to a resident's summer house in New Hampshire and, most recently, a Halloween party "Purim in October."

On the first floor of the Hillel house there is a li-brary that is provided for all students, as well as the JLC. It's ideal for getting away from the distractions of your room.

There is a TV lounge equipped with a television, couch, bean-bag chairs and a front seat view of Frat Row activities.

For next semester Hillel is working on getting computers for the floor and adding gym equipment to a downstairs recreational room.

In the basement of the Hillel House there is a new Kosher dining hall with "Chef Nick" — UMass's only culinary- certified chef. However, it's not mandatory to be on the plan.

"Every Friday night and Sunday brunch the JLC tries to eat their meals together here in the dining hall just to keep the sense of community and togetherness strong," said Carrie Fichbien.

If a student enjoys meeting other Jewish students and having more freedoms to do what you want without worries or restrictions, UMass's Jewish Living Community at 388 N. Pleasant St. offers that chance.

Re-examining the Holocaust

Elana Premack

The gift stores are the only parts of the building that sway from a solemn purpose to a commercial one, save perhaps the skylight. It is what you notice first — the striking light of the sun breaking through the gray in what is known as the Hall of Witness. The United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C. can be compared to a skylight in the history of memorials: a bright light to permeate the ever-present darkness.

The museum itself was built to allow visitors to live the Holocaust experience vicariously. The displays are not well- lit, and are composed of mostly black and white photographs. It is the rebuilding of the darkness that was the Holocaust which characterizes the museum. The time period is not to be glorified, but remembered. It is said that history is taught in order to avoid similar mistakes in the future. The museum avoids the commercialization of the time period and concentrates on educating the visitors and communicating the "never forget" message.

I agree with the educational approach taken by the museum's creators, but only to an extent. I agree with the philosophy of teaching history to avoid its replication, but it is a frightening history that the museum teaches. The Holocaust Museum forces one to look in the face of destruction, despite the face's haggard appearance, and despite the fact that the face cried out for help which it was denied.

Living in northern Virginia, 20 minutes outside of D.C., I have had the opportunity to visit the museum three times. I have viewed the walls papered with pictures of Holocaust victims, the naive faces smiling out of the past. I have felt the spectrum of emotions, ranging from an absorbing depression concerning the subject as a whole to a sense of relief that I was born 50 years after the end of World War II.

The Holocaust is a piece of history which I would like to believe could never happen, and perhaps that is why I do not entirely agree with the museum's purpose. Visiting the museum for a fourth time would force me out of my collegiate protective shell, back into a world where not everything is as simple as it can be at the 100-level.

I am not saying that we should not learn about the Holocaust — it is truly the only way to avoid making repeated mistakes — but I will say that the museum should not be viewed as merely a tourist attraction, as something to be seen in one day and never thought about again. The message that the museum works to communicate needs to be truly taken in — a visitor must become entirely saturated in the idea of the Holocaust. The museum provides exhibits for people from different backgrounds as to communicate the message in as many ways as possible, trying to reach as many people as possible.

Evident in the display concerning the 1936 Olympics, the museum works to express the effect of the holocaust on a world of people. The 1936 Berlin Olympics were exploited by Adolf Hitler to give the world an image of a peaceful and tolerant Germany. Hitler hid the true purpose of the Nazi regime for the two weeks of the Olympics, but the apparent peace was short-lived — Hitler almost immediately went into a full-scale takeover following the Olympics.

The United States and other Western nations rejected a proposed boycott of the Olympics, allowing Hitler to distort the true purpose of the Games and permitting the discrimination to continue. Jews including high jumper Gretel Bergmann and boxer Eric Seelig were excluded from German sports clubs and forbidden to compete in the Games.

Is it different to visit the Holocaust Museum as a Jewish person? It may be difficult to face the fact that six million of the people killed in the Holocaust shared a tie of religion, but the museum is also a testament to those other than the six million. The displays make a point to focus on the lives of victims before 1933, making the lost lives more realistic to the visitors.

Visitors to the museum look for certain landmarks — Oscar Schindler's name on the list of Righteous Gentiles, Hitler propaganda films, collections of items from Holocaust victims' homes. Everyone crowds in to watch the stories of survivors; people gently nudge one another to view the photographs of emaciated concentration camp workers. But the challenge of the museum is seeing it completely, something that cannot be done in one visit, much less three. Seeing the museum in its entirety, though, does not necessarily entail seeing every exhibit — every photograph, videotape or display.

To a greater extent, seeing it completely means walking back through the Hall of Witness and out the tall, glass and gray metal doors into the D.C. sunshine having gained something. Whether this something is a memory of a specific display — the drawings of what an Aryan was supposed to look like or the special children's memorial — or the echoing words of a survivor, it is the idea that one leaves a changed person that makes the experience complete.

Amherst photography exhibit portrays Holocaust

By Jeff Hnatio
Collegian Correspondent

In May of 1940, the German army invaded the Netherlands and the country was placed under German control. Journalism and photography were strictly censored by the Nazi regime, which sought to cover up any evidence of the atrocities which were being committed.

However, many Dutch photographers secretly photographed the arrests of Jews and confiscation of property by the German army. They also produced false identification cards and illegal newspapers as part of an underground resistance movement against the Nazis.

An exhibit is now open at the Mead Art Museum at Amherst College and displays some of the illegal photographs taken during this time. "The Illegal Camera: Photography in the Netherlands During the German Occupation, 1940–1945" is a collection of illicit images of life in the Netherlands during the second world war.

A number of the illegal photographs are of the persecution of the Dutch Jews. Some pictures depict the fenced-off ghettos the Jews were forced to live in, while others show the arrests of Jews who were later sent to concentration camps and Dutch men who were sent off to perform forced labor.

There are also photos of some of the hiding places of Jews, resistance workers, and others wanted by the Germans. A caption next to one of the photos states that of the 140,000 Dutch Jews at the start of the war, only 27,000 survived.

The exhibit contains a group of pictures of Germans seizing property. At first only Jewish property was taken, but as the war progressed anything of value was seized, especially objects made of metal — a commodity which the Germans greatly lacked. There are a number of photos of Germans stealing bicycles, clothes, machinery and even horses.

During the "Hunger Winter" of 1944–45, food and other resources were extremely scarce. A few of the photos show people illegally gathering wood. There are also two disturbing photos; one of a starving woman clutching a small piece of bread and the other of a small underweight child holding a spoon.

Another photo shows a child smiling and waving a Dutch flag after the liberation in May of 1945.

The exhibit runs Oct. 24–Dec. 17 at the Mead Art Museum at Amherst College. Weekday hours are 10 a.m.–4:30 p.m., except for Thursdays. Thursday hours are 10 a.m.–9 p.m. Weekend hours are 1–5 p.m.

Are you part of the Jewish community at UMass? Would you like to write about issues relevant to your religion and culture both here on campus and in the larger sphere of things?

The Collegian's Jewish Affairs desk is always looking for new and interesting voices to add to this page. We need students to cover events on and around campus and to write columns relevant to Jewish life.

If you're interested in breaking into the world of published writing and think your work might be appropriate to a page like this, you should come on down to the Collegian newsroom and speak with Bryan Schwartzman, Jewish Affairs Editor.

Also, if you're aware of any stories or events related to the University's Jewish community, be sure to call Bryan at 545-1762 and let him know about them.

Netanyahu's turbulent rise to power

Dan Deutch

In the spring of 1996, my nine month stay in Israel was coming to an end. It was a monumental time to be in Israel, as I watched the intense elections which promised to bring change to the peace process as we know it. While living in Arad, a small development town not far from both Massada and the Dead Sea, I eagerly awaited the big election day that May, which had filled the country with anticipation. The only thing that Israelis could agree upon was that this was an important election, the biggest that the country had ever seen, and that it was too close to report an edge belonging to either candidate.

Simon Peres had come into power after the assassination of the late Yitzhak Rabin, who was shot just after speaking at a peace rally in Tel Aviv. It was an event that would change Israel. The Zionist's dream of the Jewish people one day having their own country with the same problems that any other country would have, was finally a harsh reality. Peres was second in line, behind Rabin, and just as in any other democracy he quickly took over command.

The problem was that Peres, though overly qualified and certainly leader enough, was no Yitzhak Rabin. Rabin had unique leadership skills, and he was able to change his ways, from a army hero/general he eventually became a leader pushing for peace. Rabin was so successful as the Israeli Prime Minister that he found a way to get most of Israel to try their luck with the Peace Process. The people truly believed in Rabin, and through this trust in the leader, they wanted the leader's goal of the peace process to become a reality. Peres had his hands full trying to fill the void that existed after Rabin was assassinated, having been in charge during the heaviest run of suicide attacks in Israel's history. After the assassination, Peres had taken the reigns of the Israeli government, and it was a time where people grew tired of trying the peace process without getting any signs of approaching peace.

With the elections not too far away, it was evident that some change in policy was needed. Thus enters the Likud Party's Benjamin "Bibbi" Netanyahu. Unsure as to what events would come next, many Israelis felt at ease voting for Netanyahu. He was for the peace process, as long as the other side was keeping up its side of the bargain, which many interpreted as meaning a safer Israel. Netanyahu was also a new type of politician that Israel had not seen prior to the 1996 elections. Netanyahu was great with the media, knew how to dress and, most importantly, he knew how to form a coalition using the religious parties. Israel has a coalition-style government where citizens cast their votes for a particular party, and the more votes a party receives, the more members of congress that they have. Then the members of the government form coalition when different parties bargain, and forge together to form a coalition.

By just a single percentage point, Netanyahu did win the election. The Jewish vote was lopsided towards Bibbi, and it was the other citizens of Israel (Christian, Arab, Druze and Bedouin) that made it so close. Leah Rabin (wife of the late Yitzhak) and others talked within the media spotlight about leaving the country now that the right wing was in control. I watched and hoped for several things to happen: the peace process to continue; the religious not to gain too much power over a vastly secular country; and foremost, I wished for security to be heightened.

Now I will talk about what Netanyahu has actually done, or not done, while in power. Netanyahu has had slip up after slip up, and has not been as smooth as he was during the campaign. One of Bibbi's first actions that got a slew of media coverage was the reopening of a tunnel under the Western Wall of the Temple Mount. The action itself was questionable, but most saw nothing wrong with reopening the tunnel.

However, it was how the action was carried out that raised questions as to why it was done. Jerusalem's mayor went into the tunnel with a camera crew and a big deal was made about the event since the land that was being excavated was holy to the Muslims as well as the Jews. The event sparked some rock throwing, and several deaths on both the sides — Palestinians and Israelis too.

Then there was the Har Homa incident. The Oslo Peace Accords required that Israel not disrupt the "status quo." The importance of this is that Israel couldn't establish any new construction that would change the population ratio that previously existed. Har Homa is a mountain on the outskirts of Jerusalem, and due to overpopulation in the city of Jerusalem it was necessary to build more neighborhoods to meet the demands for housing in the area. Bibbi's blunder here was again in how he handled it, coupled with negative media coverage. When you are engaged in a peace process like the one that Israel is partaking in, your government must take precaution with every decision that it makes.

Starting construction in a new area may seem like a little thing, even though it was not upsetting the status quo, but since Israel is engaged in a peace process, little incidents are regularly magnified by the camera's lens and a journalist's pen. Israel is in the middle of a peace process which makes it necessary for them to remain uncontroversial, thus incidents like Har Homa, must be either avoided or at least dealt with in a better manner. Netanyahu is finding this out for himself that the media goes for blunders in history, which is what sells the papers unlike little baby steps that push us along the path of peace. The need for housing in the area is still a problem, and will continue to be a controversial issue for some time to come.

Last spring Israel once again began to question their status in Lebanon. It is imperative that Israel maintain security on its northern border. Last spring two helicopters collided in Lebanon, killing dozens of Israeli soldiers. Netanyahu had to deal with the issue of moving out of Lebanon, and saving the young soldiers.

Finally, this August, Netanyahu made a statement that possibly cost the lives of many innocent civilians. This occurred when Netanyahu decided that he would make the claim that Israel had become a safe and secure place, two suicide bombs went off in heavily traveled areas of Jerusalem. Many blamed Netanyahu for the suicide bombings after he had made such a claim.

Israelis now worry less about their day-to-day survival as their country approaches its 50-year mark. Perhaps Israel is just going through some dynamic changes that are making it hard for their leader to bind the countries divided factions together. The people voiced their opinions when they went to vote, as part of a democracy in the sea of Arabic countries which lack democratic rule. The people of Israel voted Benjamin Netanyahu their Prime Minister, and that is why I and many others continue to support him and the state of Israel.

The opening of the tunnel, Har Homa, problems in Lebanon, and more suicide bombings are just some of the issues that Netanyahu has dealt with. Though I do not think that Netanyahu was the best man for the position of Prime Minister, it was not him as much as it was his party and its views to which I am opposed. While I do not agree with Prime Minister Netanyahu and all that he has done I still stand by him and the country of Israel. It is my duty to do so as a Zionist supporter of Israel.

The relatively small country of Israel cannot establish a Palestinian entity within its borders without the strong support of the rest of the world. I do think that there have been some positive aspects of Netanyahu's term, however he was elected with the promise of a more secure Israel. I will argue that Israel is not a safer place than it was pre- Netanyahu. One thing that the new Prime Minister has made clear is that it takes tithe and patience to travel down the path of peace. Netanyahu has made it clear to the world that all countries involved need to play hardball for this venture of peace in the Middle East to be a reality.

Verhoeven misses with Troopers

By Adam Levine
Collegian Staff

STARSHIP TROOPERS
Directed by Paul Verhoeven with Casper Van Dien, Dina Meyer, Denise Richards
Playing at Hampshire Six Theater

At the risk of sounding insensitively harsh, Starship Troopers may just be a pleading cry for help from director Paul Verhoeven. If Total Recall and Showgirls weren't enough proof that this guy needs psychiatric attention, then Starship Troopers is about as blatant as it comes. Despite his undeniable brilliance for relentless film-making, Starship Troopers proves Verhoeven must be as twisted as his work would suggest. Yet with all that aside, he is still a fantastic artist and what's art without a little moral torture?

Marketed as a G.I. Joe in an outer space spectacle of ultra- adventure, Starship Troopers may be one of the most overlooked displays of sadism in film to hit multiplexes in years. At least there was adequate controversy surrounding Showgirls and his other homage to breasts and violence, Basic Instinct.

Starship Troopers contains no such warning, yet embedded in its non-stop-thrill-a-second exterior, is a deeply disturbing sci-fi adventure for reasons which were far from advertised. Based on a novel by Robert Heinlen, Verhoeven has created a distant future where fascism and propaganda are everyday facets of modern living. A world which offers no apologies for its in your face rhetoric and human civilizaiton has evolved into the bullies of galaxy.

If this all sounds like a criticism of national socialism, then you may be right. After all, Verhoeven was born in Amsterdam during the Nazi occupation of Holland. Surprisingly though, these criticisms don't stand out too strongly. The average male 15-year-old watching the film will most definitely be rooting for the cast of Aaron Spelling's nighttime soap-opera sub-characters, which dashingly represent Earth's fascist army of the future. The misunderstood heroes of the film are the gigantic insects who are being massacred on their home planet by our humble government, which wishes to colonize there.

When the insects, who are no smarter than their smaller cousins here, decide they don't want us there (which you'd think would be their prerogative), they retaliate by sending meteorites towards Earth, and we're never really told how they manage to pull that off.

It becomes our decision to then annihilate their species and recruit some hunky up-and-coming stars to lead the battle.

What is so dangerous is that although Verhoeven may just be making a satirical mockery within his film, his point is not well understood. We're obviously not going to cheer for the bugs — that would go against every standard of movie association (meaning how could the good guys be so ugly and the bad guys so hip and innocent?). Make no mistakes, Starship Troopers is no genre revisionism, but rather a confused work that is as unsettling as it is morally depressing. If the countless decapitations and missing limbs won't leave a bad taste in your mouth, then how about the irresponsible displays of misogynistic cliches and silly references about how war may be hell, but it sure can be an exciting time.

Starship Troopers follows the wanna-be maturing of unlikely hero, Johnny Rico (Casper Van Dien), a spacy stud and stereotypical football jock who joins the war effort to impress his flirty girlfriend. The rest of the one-dimensional characters who complete the film's cast support no other purpose than to fall victim to the bug's "tyranny" and take a stand for patriotism in their efforts. Yet, these characters are far less interesting than their enemies, who resemble the magic of computer-generated images and the keen craftsmanship that Verhoeven possesses. These bugs are the perfect soldiers, void of fear and intelligence and as relentless as hell. They follow the commands of the brain insects and, when one is captured for research by a nerdy telepath (Neil Patrick Harris), he is able to sense that the bug is merely scared. Of course this doesn't mean we should perhaps attempt to communicate, but rather it's just another victory for our this glorious war.

Verhoeven once again uses his trademark technique of the mock news footage that he first introduced in RoboCop. His absurd commercials and political TV programs add some much needed humor to Starship Troopers' intensity. The only point where we are led to think that this film's premise is wrong is during a futuristic take on "Crossfire." The liberal panelist adds that maybe we could end this feud if we just stop colonizing their planet. If that were the case, however, then Verhoeven would run the risk of making a film that criticized war and where would the fun be in that?

Starship Troopers is an event of a movie, from its portrayals of a futuristic high school (which isn't really any different than today) to basic training, an attempt to mimic a great war movie like Full Metal Jacket, and all the way up to its gruesome, yet exhilarating battle sequences. As disturbing and just plain weird as it is, Starship Troopers defines the concept of bang-for-your-buck excitement. Never has a film been so painfully naive and unmistakingly brutal. It just can't make up its mind if it wants to be petty teen melodrama or a frightening look at the future of society.

On the upside, Starship Troopers represents a world where people struggle for identity and human characteristics against the backdrops of technology gone out of control. However, this little essence of dignity can't save this film from its own destructiveness. Regardless of how exciting and well crafted a film is, it should not be an excuse for careless societal satire. Verhoeven really should be ashamed of himself. C– the league lead with 18.

Uh, yeah, that is "good."

And, we all can now officially say — even "Dandy" Don Cherry — he's good, I think we'll keep him.

Don't get me started. I just might start singing the Finnish national anthem on your collective you-know-whats, and you don't want that — even if I did know it, that is.

• I know that I've said this before, but just when the NHL and its players get a chance to distance themselves from the moral destitude of other major sports, they shoot themselves in the foot. Speaking of feet, the Washington Capitals' Chris Simon firmly inserted one into his mouth this past weekend, throwing a racial slur at Edmonton's Mike Grier.

In contrast to good, this is real "bad."

One, the use of racist language in any sense or form is one of the lowest human activities of all. And two, one of the lowest human activities of all is especially worse when it comes from a fellow minority.

Simon is an American Indian, and he says the reason why he still wears his hair long (yeah, try and pick on him about his long hair and he'll string you up by it) is because he wants to stay close to his roots. In a time when we as a society still deal with insinuous and asinine racial comments on a daily basis, from the likes of our former UMass Wonder-coach John Calipari and so-called funny-guys like Fuzzy Zoeller, this situation only adds fuel to the fire.

Even us as Anglo-Saxons have done enough damage, but when minority goes up against minority, it especially hurts.

I'm into the fire of competition that drives the hockey player, and I was known back in my days to talk some trash as well, but this goes way too far.

Shame isn't the word for this. Idiocy is more like it.

UM swims past Huskies

Back-to-back wins for women's swimming and diving season

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's swimming and diving team took a bite out of the Northeastern Huskies on Tuesday afternoon at the Joseph R. Rodgers Pool.

The Minutewomen upended their state counterparts by a score of 167–125, behind strong performances from freshman sensations Sarah Newell and Shannon Rowell. With the victory, UMass now sports a 2–1 mark in dual meets this season.

UMass	167
Northeastern	125

"I was happy with our performance today," UMass coach Bob Newcomb said. "Our times were a little slower, but I kind of anticipated that because we had two meets so close together. I was very pleased with the intensity that the team had. We were very aggressive in our swims and we finished our races very strong."

Newell took home three first-place finishes against the Huskies (100 breaststroke, 200 breaststroke, 200 individual medley), while fellow classmate Rowell was victorious twice, winning the 100 and 200 backstroke.

Other Minutewomen who had first place finishes were Karen Sonnwald in the 200 freestyle, Barbara Hickey in the 500 free, and Lia Lansky in the 200 butterfly. The 200 medley relay squad of Rowell, Newell, Andrea Spencer, and Marci Hupp was also a winner. The 400 free relay team of Spencer, Hupp, Amy Mullen and Julie Dragon rounded out the day with a first-place finish.

Massachusetts picked up its first win of the young season on Saturday afternoon at Rodgers Pool, defeating Providence College, 179–65. Newell was again the star of the day, as she set a new school record in the 200 breaststroke in only her second collegiate meet.

The Dillsburg, Pa. product set the new mark with a time of 2:24.28, eclipsing the old mark of 2:24.64 that was set by Melissa Waller during the 1988–89 campaign.

"I wasn't looking to break the record so soon," said Newell, who also finished first in the 200 IM against Providence. "In the back of my mind I knew that I wanted to break it eventually, but to do it so soon was sort of a surprise."

Hupp took first place twice, winning the 100 free and the 200 free. Senior Barbara Hickey won the 1,000 free, while Sonnwald won the 500 free. The 200 medley relay team of Rowell, Newell, Spencer and Hupp also finished first with a time of 1:51.61.

"The meet on Saturday was an A-plus," Newcomb said. "It was one of the best performances by a UMass squad in November since I've been here."

In addition to their performance in the pool, Newcomb has also been pleased with the strong team unity of the Minutewomen.

"The girls are there for each other," Newcomb said. "We're trying to continue to improve our team environment around here, because we want the girls not only to become better athletes, but better people as well."

But Newcomb is not the only one who has noticed the family atmosphere that the Minutewomen share.

"It's good to see how together this team is," Newell said. "We're a very close team, and that's something that helps you out when you're coming in as a freshman."

UMass opened up its 1997–98 season on Oct. 24 with a 204–96 loss to Boston College. Newell finished first in the 100 breast, 200 breast, and the 200 IM.

"I've sort of forgot about the first meet because we've done so much since then," Newcomb said.

Newcomb said that he is hoping the Minutewomen are able to match last year's third place finish in the Atlantic 10 championships, and to continue swimming like they have in the last two meets.

Minutewoman Notes: UMass will swim the rest of its meets during the month of November in the friendly confines of Rodgers Pool. The Minutewomen will host Boston University on Saturday at 3 p.m., and St. John's on Nov. 22 at noon.

game gave us a few more reasons to affirm the fact that Brent Musberger could very well be America's "Dork Boy," the pompous loser you love to hate.

Here's the scene. Two minutes left, third quarter. Missouri had just tied the Huskers. ABC flashes to a shot of Larry Smith, the Mizzou coach.

Enter Brent.

"If I didn't know better, I'd swear that was a tear in Larry Smith's eye."

With two minutes left. In the third quarter.

I'm sorry, but college football coaches don't cry with 17 minutes left in a tied game. If they did, they'd be in another line of work.

(Family counseling? Hallmark graphic designer?).

This is just another example of a sportscaster trying to act as though they are smarter than the viewer, a crime Bob Costas committed repeatedly in the World Series (like giving us Mike Hargrove's life story and how much it would mean to him to win a World Series— in the fifth inning of Game 7), and one Musberger is prone to commit on a weekly basis.

A little advice, guys. Listen to Keith Jackson. There's a reason we love him.

Horoscopes

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You are going to have to work quickly today to get things in order before shifting gears. A mystery is waiting to be solved.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — You will be tracking down some info today in order to come up with some important and necessary answers. Trust your gut; follow a hunch.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — It is important for you to keep track of even the most minute facts and figures today. You may be required to explain a coincidence.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — You must avoid spreading yourself so thin today that you cannot keep track of everything under your control. Do not forget to delegate responsibility.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — You may find yourself coordinating many things today. Focus on achieving the result that you have had your eye on the longest.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — Your attention must not be wasted on issues that do not concern you today. Focus instead on those things which involve your direct influence.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You may not understand just what is expected of you today, and instructions you receive aren't likely to help. Use your intiative — carefully.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — You must strive to do things in an established manner today in order to avoid the kinds of criticism that you have attracted in the past.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — Personal contentment is very likely to be a major concern for you today. Perhaps you are trying to achieve too much at one time. Simplify.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You can learn a great deal through simple observation today. Keep your eyes and ears open for messages meant for others, but which concern you.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You can enjoy your day in a manner that is unique and unexpected. Do not even try to fit into a mold that someone else has made for you.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — A compromise of sorts is in order at this time. You must stay the course, but your focus along the way may have to shift in a very subtle manner.

Quote of the Day

"If a woman has to choose between catching a fly ball and saving an infant's life, she will choose to save the infant's life without even considering there are men on base."

NCAA tournament on horizon for UMass

Minutewomen resume rivalry with Crimson this Sunday at Ohiri Field in Cambridge

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

If the road is what the Massachusetts women's soccer team had to get used to the past month and a half of the season, then why not just be consistent?

Following their Atlantic 10 championship title won last Sunday, the No. 16 Minutewomen received the automatic bid to the NCAA Tournament — their 15th appearance out of 16 tournaments, and the third most in NCAA history.

Yesterday afternoon, the seedings for this year's tourney were released, and it could be said that consistency was the main factor. Once again, the Minutewomen will hit the road for their first round opponent, culminating a stretch that has seen the team travel for six of the last seven weeks — and once again, they will face Harvard at 1 p.m. this Sunday, as they did last season.

On Nov. 17, 1996 the two teams faced off in the first round match at Ohiri Field, with what could be easily termed as a classic evolving into a third overtime period.

Then-junior defender Erica Iverson finished off her one- goal day with a long cross that flew into the Crimson penalty area, and as a Harvard defender tried to head the ball away, the own goal capped off a 152-minute match that gave UMass the 2-1 win.

The two perennial Northeast Region powerhouses will face off once again, and UMass coach Jim Rudy likes the bracket his team has been put in.

If they defeat Harvard, an easier second-round opponent appears in the winner of the George Mason/Maryland in College Park, Md. Last year, the Minutewomen had to face then-No. 4 Connecticut in the second round, so this year might hold a different result than a 2-0 loss in 1996 — if UMass can get that far.

"We're in a real good bracket," Rudy said. "We ended up dodging all the monsters in the first two rounds, but we're disappointed because we didn't get a higher seed, and it seems they didn't factor in our strength of schedule. If you play a weaker schedule, and you win your conference tournament, I guess you're picked higher.

"But hey, we're glad to be there. Last year was a tough draw, but this year is almost perfect for our younger team."

The Ivy League was not as strong this season as prior years, but Harvard was still able to capture the title without the services of last season's National Player of the Year finalist, Emily Stauffer.

For the rest of UMass' regional rivals, UConn will host Mid-America champion Fairfield, and Hartford will host the Patriot League champion, Colgate. Contrary to previous seasons, UConn and UMass are not in the same bracket, which is good news except for the fact No. 1 North Carolina is in the Minutewomen's bracket.

JORMA KANSANEN / COLLEGIAN

The A-10 title got the Minutewomen into the NCAA tournament, and they will travel to Harvard in the first round this Sunday at 1 p.m.

Women's basketball begins with preseason experience

By Jackie Leroux
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team played in an exhibition game Monday night at the William D. Mullins Center that was really more of a two-fold test for the Minutewomen — a test to see how well the team has come together thus far, and a test of their potential.

UMass	60
Rossiyanka	81

Despite losing 61–60 to Rossiyanka, a squad on tour from Russia, the Minutewoman rookies proved their talents, and showed they have definite promise for the future. With the game coming down to the wire in the final minutes, UMass coach Joanie O'Brien let her freshmen handle the pressure.

"Quite obviously, if we were trying to win, I would have made some substitutions, since I had my entire starting five on the bench for the last five minutes," O'Brien said. "But this game was about learning, and the young kids were able to put themselves in a position to win."

UMass put in a solid first half, and began the second with a six-point lead. The Minutewomen managed to increase that lead to nine points with 16:30 left in the half, but two straight three's by Rossiyanka's Yelena Novak got the Russian team on a 12–0 run that put them up, 43–40.

UMass guard Kelly Van Huisen hit two foul shots to bring her team within a point, but Rossiyanka's 6-foot-2 center Yelena Nikopolskaya quickly drilled a three to protect the lead.

For each basket the Minutewomen made in the next several minutes, Rossiyanka had an answer. Forward Yolanda Rayside made a layup to bring the Minutewomen within two, but it was immediately followed by a layup from Anna Monakhova.

Another three pointer from Novak and a layup from Nikopolskaya put Rossiyanka up by seven.

This was followed by an 11–4 run by the Minutewomen that had the score knotted at 57 with 5:44 remaining. The score was stuck there until Rossiyanka's Julia Fedoseyeva made the first of a one–and–one to put the Russians up by a point. With both teams over the foul limit, free throws played a key role for the remainder of the game.

Freshman Kathy Coyner had a chance to give the Minutewomen the lead when she was fouled by Nikopolskaya. The call was hotly argued by Rossiyanka coach Pavel Nurazar, and UMass' Lucia Madajova, who speaks six languages, quickly stepped in and explained the call for him. Coyner missed both free throws, but redeemed herself shortly after when she stole the ball and made a layup with under a minute to go.

The basket put UMass up 59–58, but two free throws by Nikopolskaya put the visitors back in front by a point. The game was tied yet again when freshman Kara Trent hit one of two free throws, but Fedoseyeva won the game on a free throw with less than four seconds left in the game.

Van Huisen had a team high 13 points in the game, followed by Alison MacFarland and Kara Tudman with nine each, and Trent with seven. O'Brien blamed poor transition defense and missed free throws for the loss.

"Our transition defense was poor, which probably cost us the game," O'Brien said. "They all missed at least one free throw. But they were able to get those first game jitters out of the way."

People are strange, but, the Alliance is even stranger

There is nothing stranger in this world than college football rankings in November.

Consider this.

Nebraska, the old No. 1, beat the current No. 25 team on the road. For this, it loses the top spot.

Michigan beats the old No. 2, Penn State, by 26 points on the road, and are undefeated in the best conference in America. For this it gets the No. 1 ranking.

But only in one poll.

Florida St beats the old No. 5.

Luke Meredith on College Football

North Carolina, by 17 points on the road. Also undefeated.

For this it gets the No. 1 ranking.

But only in one poll.

It gets better.

UCLA? The Bruins are 7–2, enough to be No. 9 in the country. Fellow PAC–10 school Washington St. is 8–1, behind the strong arm of "Pimp Daddy of the Year" front runner Ryan Leaf.

For this the Cougars are No. 14.

Hmmmm…

Wisconsin is 8–2, and play in the Big 10. The Badgers are No. 23. LSU is 7–2, and plays in the SEC. The Tigers are No. 11.

I could go on and on (Georgia No. 7?), but that would be beating a dead horse, or whatever dead animal you choose to beat. (We here at the Collegian advise you not to beat any dead animals, though.)

Are there solutions?

Well, of course there are. If they wanted to avoid this mess in the future— a mess that is annual as leaves changing, or bad sitcoms on CBS (Murphy Brown?)— they could do something. Obviously the Alliance (all hail the mighty Alliance) isn't doing any good.

But if they took the winners of the Big 10, Big East, PAC–10, SEC, ACC, Big 12 and two at–large bids (for which the WAC, Mid–American and Notre Dame could fight) they could settle this thing on the field, and leave the polls to what they should be for.

Something to debate, not the answer.

But then, I imagine someone out there would still complain. But they'd be from either North Texas or Bowling Green, and that's a hell of a lot easier to take than someone from Michigan, like it is now.

Perhaps winning became too much of a habit — perhaps only so many cans be spent in the crossfire of every challenger to the Eastern water polo crown. Whatever the reason, the No. 10 Massachusetts men's water polo team finally felt the sting of defeat this past weekend in the Collegiate Water Polo Association Eastern Championships.

With two seconds left in Sunday's title game, John Vassig's top–corner goal gave Queens a 10–9 victory over UMass. The Royals become the only Eastern team other than UMass to make the NCAA Final Four in water polo.

On Saturday, UMass notched a couple of one–goal victories to advance to the finals, beating Slippery Rock by a 12–11 score and downing No. 18 St. Francis, 9–8.

Junior Brian Stahl, the Minutemen's offensive spark all year, netted four goals to lead the team over Slippery Rock. Saturday evening, UMass opened up a 7–3 lead going into the fourth quarter. St. Francis, which had upset No. 12 Navy in the first round, responded with a five-goal barrage in the final period, but came up just short of the upset bid.

UMass	9
Queens	10

The Minutemen found themselves coming back from a large deficit against Queens in the championship game.

After a back–and forth first half, the score stood knotted at 4–4 at halftime. The Royals quickly scored out of the break, slamming two quick two–pointers past sophomore goalie Richard Huntley.

"That's the only time in the game that we didn't follow game plan," UMass coach Russ Yarworth said. "We left open their two shooters and paid for it. I had to burn a time out, which came back to hurt us in the end."

Down by four goals, the Minutemen staged a ferocious rally, pounding home five straight scores to take the lead, 9–8. However, the time out taken early in the third quarter came back to haunt them. Midway through the fourth quarter, a Queens penalty gave UMass a man–advantage.

But the Minutemen, having just one time out left, could not afford to stop play to set up an organized attack. UMass failed to score on the possession.

Queens tied the contest with just over two minutes left. The Minutemen offense had two opportunities in the final minute, but each time the tough Royal defense held strong. With two seconds left, Vassig — the tournament's MVP — fired his goal into the UMass net.

The Minutemen will finish up their season this weekend with an appearance in the Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference Tournament.

"Next season starts now," Yarworth said, billing the upcoming competition as an early start for the 1998 campaign.

Looking backward; while Selanne fires, Simon is plain tired

Looking backward into the few years (the few years, Jorma?) that I've been a columnist here at the Daily Collegian, the one thing I can't be faulted on is the blatant exhibition of my national pride.

You see, I'm an American citizen…

But, I'm from Finland.

From the endless touting of anything of worth that evolves from my homeland — like Ajax of Amsterdam's Jari Litmanen to Notre Dame soccer's Anne Makinen (well, not her at all, but how 'bout lighting up UConn the other day in the Big East final?) to the Montreal Canadien's Saku Koivu — in my oh–so objective mind, it really doesn't come much better than anything wearing the old blue and white.

Jorma Kansanen on

Those are the colors of the Finnish flag, you dimwit!

Once again, the neverending spout of nationalistic sentiment emanates and I just have to say…

How 'bout that Teemu Selanne?

With a season that has seen his cohort in crime, a selection to the 1997–98 All–Holdout team in Paul Kariya, spend all his time on the neighborhood pond instead of the Arrowhead Pond, Selanne has continued to show the NHL he has game.

You know, the dominant trait relating to the "game" gene, not the recessive trait relating to the "game" gene of my other countrymen like Mikko Makela, Jarmo Kekalainen, etc. I could go into my thoughts on the whole argument concerning the dominant and recessive traits concerning the "dork" gene in all of us, but that's another topic altogether.

Speculation surrounded the Finnish international at the start of the season, and everybody wanted to know if he could bring his scoring touch to the ice with Kariya long gone and hard to find.

(It has been rumored that Kariya was seen with Jennifer Capriati a few weeks back, carrying a 12–pack of Natty Light while they checked into a Super Eight motel in Anaheim.) Hey, just kidding.

Coming off a natural hat trick on Monday night against San Jose — oh, you don't know what a natural hat trick is?

Well, it's three goals in one period, and that's "good."

So, coming off a natural hat trick against the Sharks, Selanne's natural goal scoring ability has now put him in

Minutewomen drop vital match in A–10

Meyers and Drennan lead team in loss

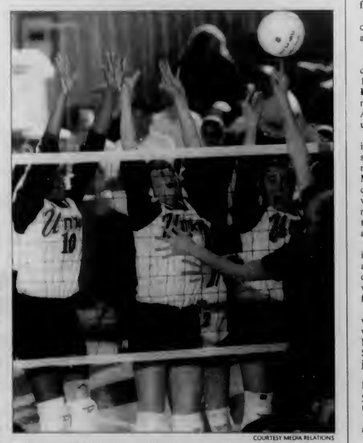
By Jamie Lee
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts volleyball team fell to host Virginia Tech last Saturday in a bitterly–contested five–game marathon match. The Hokies upended UMass, 15–13, 13–15, 15–9, 11–15, 15–5 at Cassell Coliseum. The Minutewomen are now 7–9 in the Atlantic 10, 12–15 overall.

UMass	2
Va. Tech	3

The fifth game of this match decided it, and it was all Va. Tech. The Hokies put together a severe .429 hitting attack percentage, while UMass stumbled in the fifth game, mustering a –.100 percentage, while committing six errors. Before that, the Minutewomen alternated game scores with the Hokies, battling back in the second game to nip Va. Tech by two points.

The trademark UMass defense failed to click however, and the team looked sluggish in the third game. But, the Minutewomen strung together several well–timed passes, and freshman setter Jennifer Drennan rallied the team. Drennan contributed with some key sets for sophomore middle blocker Jill Meyers, senior outside hitter Lesley Nolan and sophomore outside hitter Sarah Watters.



Yet, it seemed the Minutewomen had gotten to an all–too familiar point and were running on empty for the fifth game.

The bulk of the motion came from the Hokies late, and it came late in the game proving to be decisive. The win positioned Va. Tech in a three–way tie for fourth place in the A–10, and dropped UMass to a game behind in the chase for the final playoff spot in the post–season championship.

Minutewoman coach Bonnie Kenny said earlier this season that "it was our lack of intensity and desire that killed us," and the same seemed to be true in this case. UMass could not turn away much of what the Hokies dished out when it game down to the points that mattered.

Despite the loss, Meyers pounded out 24 kills to go with 11 digs and six blocks and has served as a bright spot during a frustrating conference stretch for UMass. Meyers ranks in the top five in the A–10 in both kills and hitting percentage, and in the top 10 in blocks, strengthening her bid for A–10 honors. She also posted back–to–back double– doubles for the Minutewomen, totaling 15 times the sophomore has accomplished the feat this season.

The Minutewomen will look to shake up the standings next week as they continue their conference road stretch at Fordham and George Washington.

Colombian reporter sixth slain this year

BOGOTA, Colombia (AP) — A Gunman shot and killed a 36-year-old radio journalist in his home in northern Colombia, his widow said Tuesday — the sixth Colombian reporter slain this year.

Francisco Castro Menco was killed Saturday in the small town of Majagual, 270 miles north of Bogota.

"We don't have any information about who the murderers were or the motive for the crime," Castro's wife Rosario told The Associated Press by telephone.

She said Castro owned and ran the local radio station for five years, had no enemies and had never received any threats on his life.

However, Castro was also an unsuccessful candidate for the Sucre state assembly in Colombia's Oct. 26 elections, which were marred by a guerrilla sabotage campaign that forced at least 2,000 candidates to withdraw.

At least 53 candidates were killed prior to the election. Majagual is in Sucre state, where leftist rebels and their paramilitary foes are locked in a bitter struggle — and the victims are mostly civilians suspected of siding with one side or the other.

Spielberg being sued for copyright violation

LOS ANGELES (AP) — The author of a historical novel about a slave ship rebellion is suing the makers of the movie Amistad, claiming Steven Spielberg's DreamWorks studio used the book without permission.

An attorney for the studio says novelist Barbara Chase-Riboud is trying to claim a copyright on history and that her lawsuit is without merit.

John Shaeffer, Chase-Riboud's lawyer, has asked U.S. District Court Judge Audrey Collins to order DreamWorks to turn over a video of the movie, which Spielberg directed, and a finished screenplay. Shaeffer said earlier drafts of the screenplay showed entire characters and scenes were lifted from Chase-Riboud's 1989 book "Echo of Lions."

Among the similarities between the novel and the movie, Shaeffer said yesterday, is the character played by Morgan Freeman. Freeman stars as Theodore Joadson, an abolitionist. Shaeffer said the character appears in the novel, but not in the historical record, thereby suggesting DreamWorks and Spielberg stole it.

"Big deal," said Bert Fields, an attorney for DreamWorks. "The world was filled with abolitionists. A lot of them were black. The characters are totally different."

Like the novel, Amistad is based on a revolt on a Spanish slave ship in 1839. The several dozen slaves attempted to sail home but were captured and tried in American courts.

Fair share could increase funding by forcing state to support schools

By Tamar Carroll
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts State Senate is considering a bill designed to ensure consistent state funding for public higher education.

Last Thursday, the Senate Ways and Means Committee released Fair Share, legislation which uses a formula–based system to determine the funding needs of each institution.

Fair Share stipulates that students and the state should each pay their "fair share" of the cost of higher education. Using standards established by the Carnegie Commission, Fair Share would have community college students pay one–forth the total cost of their education in tuition and mandatory fees and state college and university students pay one–third the total cost.

The remainder of the cost of education would be met through state and federal funding and private fundraising by the campuses themselves.

The need of each campus is determined by the legislature with a formula also used by 24 other states which bases funding on the number of students, the program distribution and the size and age of the facilities, among other factors.

Any need above that met through tuition and fees would be met by state funding and private donations.

Senator Stanley Rosenberg (D–Amherst), the chair of the Ways and Means Committee, said that Fair Share would help eliminate low budgets in rough financial years by compelling the state to support public higher education.

"The goal is to create predictable funding for the public colleges and universities and that students pay a fair share and the state is forced to pay its fair share," Rosenberg said. "We are trying to prevent there being a lot of bad years."

Rosenberg said that although the past five fiscal years have resulted in relatively good budgets for public higher education from the legislature, there is nothing to prevent the legislature from downsizing the budgets, as it did in the 1980s, if the economy sours.

"The status quo is good right now, but there is no guarantee that those circumstances will stay the same," Rosenberg said. "What we are trying to do is take that unpredictability out. That would be historic, and that is our goal."

The Fair Share bill also provides matching funds from the legislature for private monies raised by the institutions.

"We will match their contributions," Rosenberg said. "For every private dollar given, the state will give 50 cents, to stimulate outside giving."

The matching funds portion of the bill was put in place two years ago. The legislature gave $11 million to the University of Massachusetts system in matching funds in fiscal year 1997 and $14 million in fiscal year 1998. Eventually, Rosenberg said, the goal is $55 million from the legislature in matching funds.

This is the third year Fair Share is before the legislature. The past two years, the bill passed the Senate but died in the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives.

The full Senate has to approve the bill before it goes on to the House. Rosenberg said he hoped that if the Senate gets the bill to the House earlier than in the past, it will have a greater chance of being passed this year.

Jason Veccio, student coordinator of the Student Center for Education, Research and Advocacy (SCERA), said that Fair Share would benefit students by creating stable funding for public higher education.

"It definitely has its advantages," Veccio said. "It creates stability for all the campuses."

However, Veccio said he would like to see "more aggressive" legislation that would reduce the cost of education for students.

"From a student perspective, they need to somehow change the formula. I think that one–third may be too high," Veccio said.

Veccio said that the way the formula is applied to Massachusetts schools is unfair because it leaves tuition and fees for Massachusetts students among the highest in the nation.

"It just can't be right," Veccio said. "There needs to be some kind of effort to lower student costs and increase the quality."

The current political and economic conditions of the state, Veccio believes, would allow a more ambitious bill to pass the legislature.

"We need to be exploring even more aggressive legislation, and place more of an emphasis on student costs," Veccio said. "Still, Senator Rosenberg definitely deserves our thanks for initiating discussion about investing in public higher education."

SGA names committee chairpersons

By Victoria Groves
Collegian Staff

One motion was passed and committee chairs were announced at last night's meeting of the Student Government Association (SGA) undergraduate student senate at the University of Massachusetts.

Senator Paul Ferro (Commuter Area) put forth a motion to alter the current "no vote" procedure to account for abstentions during voting at senate meetings.

"Whereas, the current voting procedure of Ayes, Nays, and "No votes" is very confusing to many senators… abstentions are a widely used and effective means of properly expressing a legislature's true opinion," wrote Ferro.

The motion was given a negative recommendation by the Administrative Affairs committee and Chair Jennifer Casasanto (Southwest Area) addressed the senate to explain the lack of support.

Alfred talks on Native Americans in Canada

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Correspondent

In the United States, there are basic principles in the law that respect the autonomy of Native American people that Canada does not have, said Dr. Gerald Taiaiake Alfred in a lecture last Friday.

"Canada is about 50 years behind the U.S. in regard to Native American rights," Alfred said.

Canada has basically denied the lands of Native peoples, and as a result, the fight to maintain their land has divided the Native peoples.

Many Indian leaders are focusing on the money, travel and status of being in the Indian leadership community and lose touch with their own community, said Alfred. The leaders co–op, or sellout, to the Canadian government. They want different things than the communities they represent.

The grassroots community wants to return to traditional forms of government. According to Alfred, they believe the only way to "invigorate Natives again is by bringing back Native values."

The grassroots community wants a non–coercive governme–nt that respects the peoples' autonomy and a consensus–based design for making decisions that doesn't separate the people from the leaders and respects the role of women, Alfred said.

"Using this Native style of government is the only way to exist with some integrity as Native people," Alfred said.

The attitude of the Canadian government toward letting Natives have their own government is "so long as you do it our way, we'll give you power," Alfred said.

According to Alfred, the Indian leadership supports this idea because it will bring in government money. They believe, "We must move forward, integrate into outside institutions," Alfred said.

"The question as a leader is: Are you just going through the motions, not thinking who you answer to, or are you aware and thinking and serving the community, making a con–scious attempt to further the interest of your community and not the government?" Alfred said.

"We are almost at an impasse because we have a leadership committed to integration, but a grassroots community who want to go back to the traditional," Alfred said.

"Canada has been effective in dividing our communities by drawing some close and pushing others away, and we're playing right into their hands," Alfred said.

According to Alfred, part of the reason Canada and the United States are so inflexible towards Native Americans is because of myths and inaccuracies in history.

"A big problem in society in general is the mis–interpretation of History," Alfred said.

"Native people have not capitulated to the extent we think they did. We think Natives are in the position they are in because they signed away their land, but this is not true in Canada. There wasn't any understanding they were giving their land away. They thought they were sharing it with the Europeans," Alfred said.

"We have to take a multifaceted approach to attack myths and undermine prejudice. We need to attack on a legal basis. The relationship [between Native Americans and the Canadian government] is unjust to the people and unjustified in terms of workability. Native Americans in Canada couldn't make a land claim or have non–natives give them money for a land claim until 1972," Alfred said.

"The Natives only control their land six inches deep. If they want to pull out a weed and its roots are over six inches long, technically they have to ask permission of the government before they do it," Alfred said.

Native Americans have a value system in their culture of welcoming and acceptance to newcomers. For several generations Whites and Native Americans lived peacefully together. Natives accepted the Whites with open arms for several reasons.

In many of the tribes there had been prophesies of the white man coming and white representa peace in the Native American culture. There is a phrase meaning respect given to all people from all places and races called "Tomorrow Wampum" that natives live by. This open welcome laid the groundwork for European dominance in the future, said Alfred.

Natives were subject to plagues unimaginable today. They were losing 70–90 percent of their populations. The white settlers took over while they were weak, said Alfred. The Natives were subject to the whim of people on the outside said Alfred.

"There was the assumption the Native Americans would die off in a few generations. It was this assumption that led the Canadian government to pass the "Indian Act" in 1851.

It was a law to organize the disposal of Indian land when the Natives are gone. It stated that Indians can use the land until the last one dies off. This is an inherently racist premise that says eventually Natives will die off or go away, and it is still used today," Alfred said.

Now the numbers of Native Americans are growing and because of the premise that Native Americans are a de–feated people, it is hard for the Canadian government to relate to them as a power, Alfred said.

The lecture was sponsored by The Josephine White Eagle Cultural Center, the Native American Student Association and AISES.

Police, EWC respond to fourth acquaintance rape

By Leigh Faulkner
Collegian Staff

A fourth acquaintance rape in the past month was reported to the University of Massachusetts Police on Tuesday. The alleged incident occurred on Nov. 7 in an Orchard Hill Residence Hall.

Campus police and the Everywoman's Center (EWC) staff are concerned about the number of reports in a short period of time, but are also relieved that women are coming forward and reporting the sexual assaults.

"Its unfortunate that rape occurs at all, but knowing what the definition of rape is, I know it goes on all the time," UMass police detective Joanne O'Connor said. "Often people discount it because it happens with someone that they know on some level, but rape is rape."

Rachel Thornburn, Assistant Director of the Counselor/Advocate program at EWC described the major difference between acquaintance rape and stranger rape.

"You can't trust anybody that you thought you could after you have been raped by someone you know," Thornburn said, "whereas with stranger rape, anybody has the potential of harming you."

O'Connor said that society has the misconception that stranger rape is more harmful than acquaintance rape.

"Unfortunately, society looks at stranger rape as more upsetting because they can envision someone rushing out from the bushes and attacking a person, but no one wants to believe that a family member or friend can rape," O'Connor said.

Victims try to fix the situation in their minds by figuring out what they could have done differently, said Thornburn, like locking their doors at night or not walking on a dark, unlit path.

"Many times there is shame and embarrassment by the victim because the person was a friend of the family or a family member," O'Connor added.

Both the police department and EWC want rape victim– survivors to know they have control over the decision to prosecute.

O'Connor said there is a myth among victims that if they choose to report the rape, they must prosecute.

"Victims have a great deal of say if the prosecution goes forward... they can choose to stop it at any phase," she said.

According to Thornburn, when a person is raped, legally, it is a crime against the state and not the individual. "It is possible to go forward in the prosecution without the victim– survivor," Thornburn said. "However, it is very rare that a prosecution will continue or win without the victim– survivor."

If a victim–survivor chooses to stop the prosecution, the case can still be prosecuted up to 10 years from the date the sexual assault was reported under statute of limitations, said O'Connor.

In addition, any evidence that was obtained at the time of the sexual assault or at the time of the report can be used during prosecution.

"We try to collect evidence in the form of clothing and bedding. Anything that may contain hairs, fibers or semen samples," said O'Connor.

In addition to collecting physical evidence, police also try to determine who the first person was that the victim told about the sexual assault.

"This person becomes known as the fresh complaint and they can testify if the victim decides to prosecute, although the information is second hand, the fresh complaint is the exception to the hearsay rule," explained O'Connor.

When a rape is reported to the police department, the officer finds out if the victim, whose name remains confidential, has any injuries, requires any medical attention and if the person is safe in their environment.

"Just because a person doesn't have cuts and bruises on the outside doesn't mean that there aren't any internal injuries. In addition, the victim is also tested for STDs and AIDS," O'Connor said.

"Any officer can handle the case, but we like to have an officer who has been trained in sexual assaults," she said.

The EWC provides counselor/advocates who educate the victims on information about law enforcement, legal, medical and social services. The counselor/advocates may also serve as a liaison between the victim and any other agencies to which the incident is reported. Short term counseling is also offered to victims for a maximum of 15 weeks. Anyone who has been sexually assaulted or is concerned about someone who has may call the EWC's 24–hour hotline at 545–0800 and talk to a counselor/advocate.

All of these services are free and confidential and open to the Five College community and all Hampshire County residents.

"The committee felt the abstentions would be a 'no vote' and perhaps a weak way to say 'no'... There is ample time to get more information if you're not sure what you're voting on," Casasanto said.

The motion was passed by a two–thirds vote in the senate.

Seven committee chairs were also announced at last night's meeting: Ways and Means, Seth Avakian (Southwest Area); Administrative Affairs, Jennifer Casasanto (Southwest Area); Elections Procedure, Benjamin Gaumond (Southwest Area); University Policy, Carl Litsch (Commuter Area); Public Policy, Becky Friedman (Southwest Area); Women's Issues, Amy Pellegrino (Orchard Hill Area); and Public Relations, Brian Palmucci (Commuter Area).

Gregory Lozier was appointed to the Student Judiciary after much debate on the senate floor. According to the SGA Constitution, the president has 30 days to appoint someone to a vacancy in the judiciary. If she does not do so, the senate is able to vote someone into that office.

However, since the senate was not aware of how long the position was left vacant, President Lia Wong moved to appoint both Lozier and Megan DeMariano to positions in the Student Judiciary.

"Regardless of when [the positions] opened up, the President beat the senate to this," said Peter Kilbourne, speaker of the senate, who eventually ruled both appointments dilatory.

Lozier was appointed later in the night through another procedure.

"I want to be on the judiciary because I think it needs to be active. They have problems... we need a judiciary that works, right now it doesn't," said Lozier.

There was some controversy over the appointments because it was not formally posted that Wong was looking for individuals to fill the vacancies in the judiciary.

"How would we know that these positions were vacant if they weren't posted?" said Neil Collins (Commuter Area).

"I personally would not want to just grab any person. I would rather get someone with experience. These names were forwarded to me by the previous Attorney General," Wong said.

Friedman resigns as SWAG governor

By Victoria Groves
Collegian Staff

Daniel Friedman has resigned from his position as governor of Southwest Area Government (SWAG) as of last Friday.

Elected to the position last spring, Friedman cited lack of student interest and involvement as his reasons for resigning as governor.

"Residents of Southwest didn't care if programs were running well or if we had them at all," Friedman said.

SWAG held one event so far this semester, a Halloween party, that in Friedman's opinion was poorly attended.

Lieutenant governor of SWAG Emily Livingston, according to the area government charter, assumed the position of governor when Friedman resigned. According to Livingston, however, she will not be permanently accepting the position.

"Automatically [Livingston] becomes acting governor because [Friedman] has resigned officially," said Peter Kilbourne, speaker of the senate.

"I just don't want to do it if I can't commit the full time to being governor," Livingston said.

She also agreed that there were problems with the resident involvement in SWAG activities.

"I don't think there was a strong attempt by the governor and by us as a whole to connect with Southwest," Livingston said.

Livingston would like to remain lieutenant governor and is currently discussing with other officers who will eventually become Governor and how to become more effective.

"First off we should internally get ourselves organized. We also talked about Southwest Week. We want to use most of our money towards that this year," Livingston said.

According to Livingston, SWAG has spent $3000 on programming for Southwest in conjunction with other organizations this semester.

Friedman expressed interest in being involved in SGA as a senator instead of leaving student government completely.

"Area government is supposed to be straight advocacy and I wasn't able to do that. So it may be better in the Senate," Friedman said.

SWAG is currently accepting applications from residents of Southwest to fill the position of SWAG appointee to the undergraduate student senate.

Prof. Jones lectures on business world; claims innovation and enterprise valued

By Victoria Groves
Collegian Staff

Professor Anita Jones of the University of Virginia spoke yesterday afternoon at the Morrill Science Center on "Innovation: The American Way: Unspoken Compacts and Unsealed Covenants." This was the third in a series of lectures sponsored by the Computer Science department at the University of Massachusetts.

Jones lectured to a crowd of approximately 100 and discussed the business world and the values it places on innovation and enterprise. She explored some of the unwritten and unspoken relationships between organizations and the business world.

"There are some visions that sit behind investments government makes... it is very good that the investments government make are spread across various places," Jones said.

Jones also spoke about the importance of universities and small businesses being able research new technologies as they evolve.

"Let smart people get to the technology... there needs to be an investment to making it possible for researchers at universities and small businesses to gain access to fabrication," Jones said.

Jones was the director of defense research and engineering for President Clinton during his first term of office. She was also responsible for the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency, oversaw the Department of Defense laboratories and served as principle advisor to the secretary of defense on defense–related scientific and technical matters. Jones has also published over 33 technical articles and two books on computer software and systems.

There are two more lectures slated for this academic year: Alex Pentland of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology Media Lab, who will speak on "Smart Rooms, Smart Clothes," Wednesday, Dec. 3, and Christos Papadimitriou of the University of California Berkeley, who will speak on "Computational Aspects of Organization Theory," on Wednesday, May 6, 1998. All talks take place in Morrill North room 329 at 4 p.m.

Women weigh in on Promise Keepers

Several weeks ago, I wrote a column about the Promise Keepers, the evangelical Christian men's group that is enjoying enormous popularity. The group has received a lot of praise for its ability to rally men to commit themselves to being better husbands and fathers, but also has been criticized for encouraging men to reclaim their role as the head of the family.

After that column was published, many Promise Keepers challenged me to ask women how they feel about the Promise Keepers. So I asked women if they would want to be married to a Promise Keeper. Here is what they said:

FOCUS ON WOMEN

SARA ECKEL

Many Promise Keeper wives wrote in to describe the wonderful changes that have taken place in their husbands since joining the organization. "My three daughters have seen a dad who is more attentive and compassionate and responsive to their feelings," writes a woman who describes herself as a "Promise Reaper." "It is time for men to take up the reins of leadership— and it starts in the home... [It] then goes out to the community, the state, the country and then the world."

Indeed, there were a surprising number of women who wrote in support of the male leadership role. "I am willing to 'submit' myself to someone who is looking out for my best interest instead of just his, loves and cares for me, would lay down his life for me," writes one reader.

A Massachusetts woman describes herself as a former feminist who has seen the light: "Yes! Yes! Yes! I would like for every woman to be involved with a man who believes in the honorable promises that the Promise Keepers outline. With a foundation like that in their relationships, hopefully they will avoid much of the pain many of us 'older' women experienced."

And Ian says in an e-mail that even though she has experienced a lot of autonomy in her lifetime— she had a master's degree and four years of Peace Corps experience under her belt before she married at the age of 31— she is happy to submit to her husband. "The president of the United States makes decisions which I do not like but I am bound by them. My husband (who has less education and is eight years younger than I) may make decisions with which I disagree, but he has to give an account to God for his choices."

Finally, several women said that they would love to see their husband take charge and give them a break: "Yes, I would love for him to become the leader of the household," writes a reader. "I could use the vacation!"

But for every reader who pined for a Promise Keeper, there was one who said no thanks. "I don't [care] if one of these 'Promise Keepers' licks my floors and toilet bowls clean — no way would I be married to one," writes Valerie in an e-mail. "My answer is an emphatic no way. Sounds like a bunch of men looking for sheer numbers to unite their home-life power trips," writes Gretchen from Indiana (who, incidentally, reports that her Promise Keeper ex-husband is delinquent in his child-support payments).

"I find it very strange that the Promise Keepers and their wives don't believe two rational, grown people who love each other can't come to a mutual decision," writes C.P., whose conservative Christian parents were very disappointed when she discovered feminism. "They said I would be a very unhappy woman some day and would not have a good marriage. They were very wrong about that."

"I think it is great that these men are so involved in working hard on their family situations," writes Kathy, a 65-year-old grandmother of 11. "However, I do not believe that it has to relate to whether they are the 'boss' in the family— that seems to point up their insecurities."

Indeed, many women noted this paradox. "Do men have no better self-image that they have to have authority over women to be men?" asks Joanna from Kansas.

Finally, Patricia proffered an alternative definition of masculinity: "My husband is a man in the true sense of the word. [He] is my best friend, my partner... My husband does not need to the 'head' of the household, which stems from his confidence, self-assurance and the fact that he truly likes himself."

The winter of our discontent

There's something very soothing about the first few flurries of the season. It sort of cascades down, charismatically light, and with a chilly breeze rattling the old bones, thoughts of hot chocolate, sleds and 4:30 p.m. sunsets fill the air. Winter is much maligned the rest of the year, but when it finally comes, its intrinsic beauty always catches me in a bit of nostalgic wonder. There's something about the harshness of a New England winter that breeds a healthy dose of Puritan chastity.

Luke Meredith

Of course, I hate Puritans.

I also hate winter. And the whole "intrinsic beauty, nostalgic wonder" bit? I haven't owned a sled in years, and hot chocolate makes me want to hit the men's room. Repeatedly.

Let's not kid ourselves. Winter's coming. I wore a sweater and a fleece jacket today, and I froze my ass off. I found my gloves when I cleaned out my closet on Saturday, and became depressed when I realized that it was a good thing I found them, because I'm going to need them soon. Like tomorrow. Thanksgiving's in two weeks, the signpost for the coming of cold weather, and you know who came up with that one. (Yep, Puritans.)

My winter jacket is five years old (and it used to be so, so cool). I don't have winter boots because some kid stole them from Boyden while I was playing intramural hoops last winter.

There will be no "intrinsic beauty" this year.

I say we get summer back. At least until April.

You know why?

Because I want to get a peeling tan. I want to run up the electric bill by blasting the air conditioning. I want to throw things at the TV watching the Red Sox split a doubleheader with Kansas City. I want to be able to go out to the bars wearing a T-shirt and drink because it's so damn hot. (Yeah, that's it.) I want to tell my friends I'll go running with them, and then fall asleep while they whine about how lazy I am. I want to do shots of tequila, lick the lime and know that it just tastes better when it's 80 degrees out. I want to get a sunburn. I want to play basketball until I can't stand, and then go swimming, whining about how I'd be playing better if it wasn't so hot out. I want to see chicks wearing shorts and t-shirts.

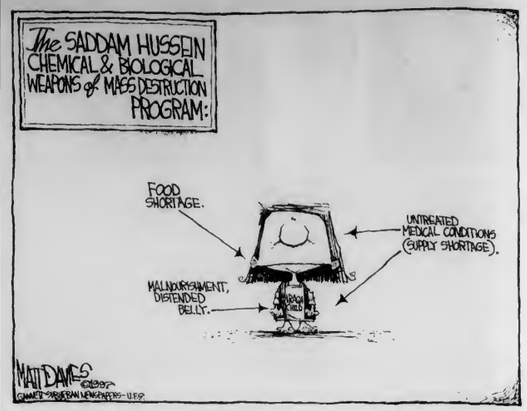
Even the ones that shouldn't.

I don't ski. I don't get in snowball fights with the neighbors. I don't luge. I'm not overly friendly to Canadians. I don't watch old tapes of Debbie Thomas pulling off a triple-axel at the 1998 Olympics and go practice figure skating on the pond in the backyard. (And if you remember Debbie Thomas, God bless ya'.) I don't own a winter hat. I'm not going to buy a winter hat. I don't have many pairs of thermal socks. I hate slush, I hate snow and I hate icicles.

I do, however, love PowerAdes on a hot summer day. I love Flavor-ices. I love cold Busch Light (which tastes much better when you're financial outlook is like mine.) I love cook-outs with James Taylor's "Sweet Baby James" in the background. I love drunken wiffle-ball games with my fellow Mill Valley brothers, where talking smack is much more important than the score. I love being forced to watch the NBA playoffs. I love playing catch.

I even love pollen.

I don't like shoveling snow. I don't like looking forward to another wintersession in a dead Amherst. I don't like wet socks. Hell, I don't like socks.



For those of you who love winter, God bless ya'. I'm sure checking trail openings at Loon is more exciting than I realized. And hey, college basketball's in the winter. I'll give you that.

But it gets dark early. It's cold. You can't walk to the mailbox in shorts. Winter seems to make me want to put on a Soundgarden album and stare at the bare trees out the window.

I'd rather put on a Jimmy Buffet album, stare at a cold Busch Light, play wiffleball barefoot and bitch about "this damn heat."

With my five year-old winter jacket safely tucked into my closet, collecting dust.

The Doublethink of the '90s

Superior wages await you

Nike was burned once again when an internal report on working conditions by accounting firm Ernst and Young was leaked to the press. The report describes a factory near Ho Chi Minh City where employees were working an average of 65 hours a week to earn an entire $10. Besides great wages, Ernst and Young also looked at the quality of the work environment and discovered the factory exceeded local standards for carcinogens by a mere 177 times. But lest you begin worrying, it should be known that Nike has an "action plan" to deal with the situation. They also have reassuring words spoken by PR representative Vada Manager. "There's a growing body of documentation," he says, "that indicates that Nike workers earn superior wages and manufacture products under superior conditions." Mr. Manager would not say where they were growing their documents, or which fertilizer they were using. (New York Times, 11/8)

"You've Come a Long Way, Baby"

In 1950, Citibank had $23 million in gold bars sitting in the Federal Reserve Bank of New York. But they had a slight problem. The bars had these nasty looking swastikas emblazoned on them. Worse yet, gold taken from Holocaust victims, politely referred to by historians as "non-monetary gold," was contained in the bars. Perplexed as to what to do, Citibank turned to the U.S. Treasury Department, who came up with the simple solution of melting the gold, or "purifying" it, and recasting it with the fine words, "United States of America," emblazoned on them. They described this, using a nicely vanitized verb, as a "reissue." And how does Citibank explain how their firm could have trafficked in Nazi gold? According to spokesman Jack Morris, "This all happened in an era when there wasn't as much introspection about this kind of transaction." I mean, where would we be without the new improved introspection on Wall Street today? (New York Times, 11/2)

The great swooshing sound revisited

Sometimes it helps to cast fresh light on old problems. For example, when N A F T A began, critics predicted that greedy U.S. corporations would shut down their U.S. plants and reopen them in Mexico. But thanks to a recent report by John Sweeney of the Heritage Foundation, we can now see the situation in its proper perspective. It turns out that industries like our automobile makers have not been fleeing the country. Instead says Sweeney, "The automotive industry— one of the most important sectors of Michigan's economy— has engaged in greater cross-border, intra-industry specialization since NAFTA went into effect." Now isn't that a more positive way to describe corporate flight? Mexico specializes in production, we specialize in... (NAFTA's Positive Impact on the United States," 11/6)

Class divisions in the cat world

In Bloomfield, Ohio, two teenagers broke into an animal shelter late at night and beat 16 cats to death with baseball bats. No known motive. Should this offense have been punished as a mere misdemeanor or treated seriously as a felony worth a possible 10 years in prison? For the jury in this case, the whole issue turned on how much each cat was worth. A felony in Ohio requires at least $500 of property damage. Thus the prosecution had to prove that each cat was worth $31.25. If the cats had been pure bred Siamese, there's no question the killings would have been a felony. But in this case the cats were strays and defense attorney Kirk Daily successfully argued that because the shelter got them for free, they had no economic value. There's a valuable lesson for teenagers here somewhere. Meanwhile rumor has it the jury is hard at work on a math book based on the trial with problems like "How many cats can Bob and Ed club if they are worth $20 a piece..." (AP, 11/7)

The rural renaissance

Long declining farming communities have found two new ways to prop up their economies. The New York Times reports the growing prison industry has become "a tool for rural development." Small towns are now competing hard for the once feared "hotels," because, in the words of Mayor Ruth Carter of Canon City, Col., "We have a nice non-polluting, recession-proof industry." Reassuring news. At the same time, many family farms are now abandoning growing vegetables for the more lucrative field of "agritainment" or "agritourism." They are opening their farms to city slickers hungry for authentic old time experiences, and charging money for hay rides, petting zoos, u-pick fruits, and corn mazes. Says farmer Rich Hodgson, "Entertainment farming is the wave of the future for small farmers." And it took our country how many years to evolve the concept of "entertainment farming"? (New York Times, 11/2)

Letters to the Editor

In defense of soaps

To the Editor:

I was appalled and disgusted by the letter to the editor that appeared (Nov. 10) about soap operas. This guy was rude, obnoxious and had no idea what he was talking about. I have been watching soap operas for the past 13 years, and my brain hasn't been damaged in any way. Watching these shows has taught me about legal proceedings, relationships and crime. Yes, I know, most of the storylines on these shows are ridiculous. But they are still enjoyable to watch. Do you see people saying that men who sit around all weekend watching football and stuffing their faces with pizza and beer are losing brain cells. I don't think so.

Soap operas are a way for people to get away from the stresses of their life by escaping to another world that is not reality. These fantasy shows give people an escape for a few hours a day. What is the crime in that? People also make puns that soap opera stars can't act. Well, why don't they try memorizing 40 pages of dialogue every day, all year long. All these other shows have to do one show a week for only 7 months out of year. Try comparing that to the number of episodes that a soap opera puts on every year.

This writer went over the line when he said that soap operas rot the brain, but he went too far when he brought "Party of Five" into this. This is definitely one of the best shows on television. With Bailey's bout with alcoholism and Charlie's recent diagnosis of Hodgkin's disease, this is a show that really deals with real life. I still don't know how this show escaped an Emmy nomination.

So, I think that before anyone continues to ridicule soap operas and make puns at their dedicated viewers, maybe they should sit down for a few days and actually watch them.

The Big 90s

Defining the '80s

Seema Gangatirkar

There is something about the '80s — a kind of "Dynasty"– type nostalgia that's got everyone wanting more.

Personally, the big hair days never appealed to me but, being rather short, I caught onto the rolled-up pants craze even before it was cool.

But the '80s... it's like this decade that everyone longs for. And if you had to look back and characterize each decade, every one had a distinguishing characteristic.

For instance, back in the '50s, everyone was jumping under desks and buying bomb shelters, in case the "Reds" ever decided to launch a few nukes at us.

In the '60s, we had the civil rights movements — Woodstock and a bunch of other things parents would rather not have their children know about.

The forgettable '70s brought us Star Wars, disco, bad clothing and "The Mary Tyler Moore Show."

But the '80s — geez, like, where to start?

I'm sure you all remember when "like" became the all– purpose word — kind of like "smurf." Everything was "like." No one ever said anything anymore, it was always "Jenny was like, and I was like..." You get the picture.

Then there were the colors. The '80s shepherded in all hues obnoxious, from outrageous lime green to neon pink. Make-up went garish with blue eyeshadow (lots of it) and bright pink lipstick. The louder you were, the cooler you were.

Next up was music. If there was anything that defined the '80s, it was the music. There was the synthesizer stuff, the wearing of underwear as outer garments, the heavily painted faces and above all — bubble–gum pop.

There were some great groups in the '80s, including Duran Duran, Def Leppard, the Thompson Twins and the Bangles. Back then, music was just fun and downright silly. I mean, really, a song like "Walk Like An Egyptian" stands less than a snowball's chance in hell these days.

In music, not only did Madonna first appear on the scene in the '80s, we also got some gems with New Kids on the Block who didn't hang tough for long. We also had Tiffany, who made her money in the shopping malls of America and Debbie Gibson, who couldn't muster past a foolish beat.

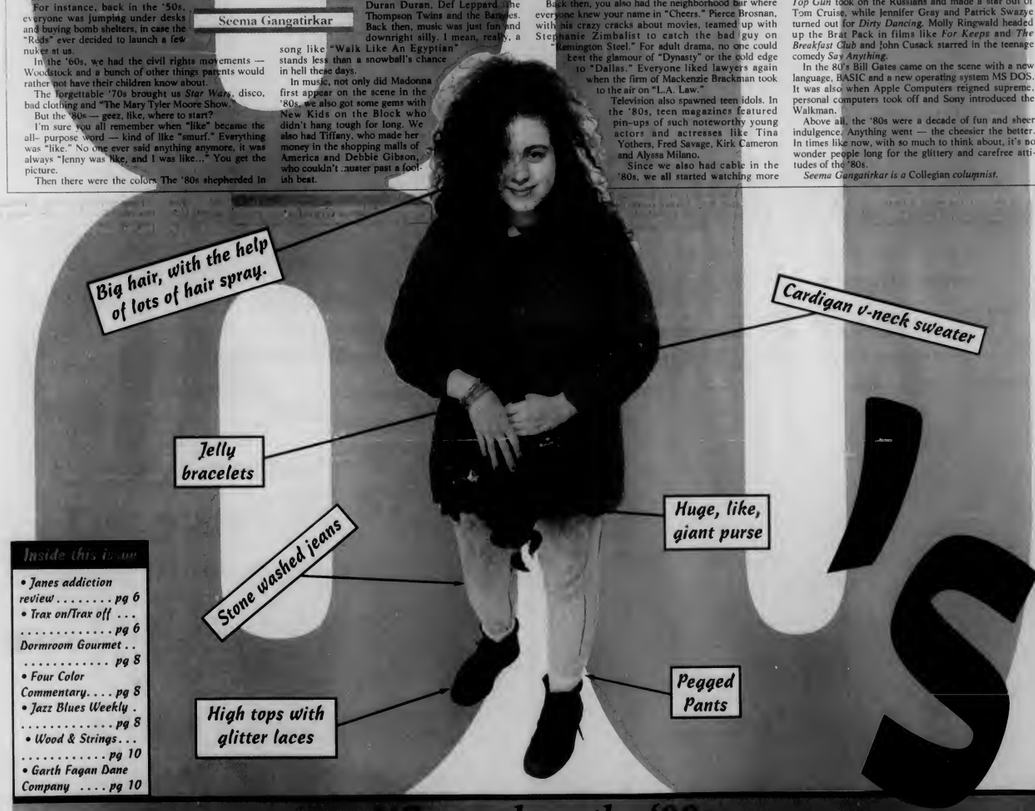
But it wasn't just music which defined the '80s. It was the whole concept on entertainment — including Hollywood and television.

Television was way funnier back in the '80s — that could just be nostalgia and old age talking. Take sitcoms...for instance; all problems could be solved in a half hour or less (if you take time out for commercials). And no one symbolized the decadence and "me" attitude of the '80s more than "Family Ties'" Alex P. Keaton.

Back then, you also had the neighborhood bar where everyone knew your name in "Cheers." Pierce Brosnan, with his crazy cracks about movies, teamed up with Stephanie Zimbalist to catch the bad guy on "Remington Steel." For adult drama, no one could best the glamour of "Dynasty" or the cold edge to "Dallas." Everyone liked lawyers again when the firm of Mackenzie Brackman took to the air on "L.A. Law."

Television also spawned teen idols. In the '80s, teen magazines featured pin–ups of such noteworthy young actors and actresses like Tina Yothers, Fred Savage, Kirk Cameron and Alyssa Milano.

Since we also had cable in the '80s, we all started watching more stuff and suddenly, we were watching music on television.



MTV first hit the air in the early '80s, playing more music in a day than it does in a week now. MTV made an entire generation of stars — including Madonna, who surely without MTV's help, would not have been able to become the star she is now.

And of course, you can't talk about the '80s and not mention Hollywood. Movies back then were more about excitement and glamour more than substance. Top Gun took on the Russians and made a star out of Tom Cruise, while Jennifer Gray and Patrick Swayze turned out for Dirty Dancing. Molly Ringwald headed up the Brat Pack in films like For Keeps and The Breakfast Club and John Cusack starred in the teenage comedy Say Anything.

In the 80's Bill Gates came on the scene with a new language, BASIC and a new operating system MS DOS. It was also when Apple Computers reigned supreme, personal computers took off and Sony introduced the Walkman.

Above all, the '80s were a decade of fun and sheer indulgence. Anything went — the cheesier the better. In times like now, with so much to think about, it's no wonder people long for the glittery and carefree attitudes of the '80s.

Six years for an hour of Jane's?

By Marty Keane

JANE'S ADDICTION
Brandeis Univ. – Gosman Center
Nov.7

WALTHAM, Mass. — Halloween came a week late for the 5,000 or so who packed Brandeis University's Gosman Center on Friday night.

The lucky ticketholders (ducats were trading hands for up to $100 a piece outside) were treated to an over-the-top visual extravaganza, complete with mysterious masked men and scantily-clad dancing girls. Yes, it's true — Perry Farrell, Lollapalooza founder, is back in the high life, again.

Jane's Addiction, the driving force that bridged the gap between the hair metal of Motley Crue and the grunge of Nirvana returned to live action after a six-year hiatus for the wildly anticipated "I–Itz M'My Party Tour."

If not for a few unfortunate (and unforeseen) incidents, it probably would have been remembered as one of "those" shows; you know, the kind of concert you endlessly brag about to your friends ad nauseam.

Even still, it was a memorable event, if ultimately a bit disappointing. There was no surprise opening set by Smashing Pumpkins (as there was in Chicago a few days earlier) — in fact, scheduled opener Goldie didn't even show up. Also, a planned mid-set acoustic jaunt to a small stage in the middle of the gym was scrapped due to extenuating circumstances.

As Farrell, guitarist Dave Navarro, drummer Stephen Perkins and bassist Flea (on loan from the RHCP) were ripping through the opening "Ocean Size," the unthinkable happened. The teeming throngs of jacked-up adolescents made a huge push toward the stage, much like what happens at every concert these days in a general admission venue.

This time however, the barricade at the apron of the stage gave way and caused a mini-emergency. The band promptly stopped playing and left the stage while the damage was cleared. Thankfully, Waltham EMTs reported no serious injuries.

After a brief intermission, the band returned and played an incendiary (albeit brief) hour-long encoreless set consisting mostly of better-known songs from their last two studio albums, 1988's Nothing's Shocking and 1990's Ritual de lo Habitual.

"Ain't No Right" sounded a bit sluggish but the band quickly shifted into overdrive on a raucous "Stop!" which brilliantly combined Flea's funki-fied bass thumping with Farrell's shaman-like presence in a glorious blast of sheer energy. "Three Days" was an epic opus, as was a majestic "Classic Girl." A sing-a-long "Jane Says" recaptured the spirit of the early '90s and the closing "Ted, Just Admit It..." left the crowd salivating for more. Too bad they didn't get their wish.

More of a trick than a treat if you ask me, but still one hell of a trick.

Soundgarden's A-Sides reeks of corporate greed

A-SIDES
Soundgarden
A&M

When asked to describe the latest release from the now-defunct Seattle heavy metal/grunge band Soundgarden, I am at an utter loss. Perhaps Butt-head put it best when he said (many a time) "What the hell is this crap?"

Indeed, the mere thought of a "Greatest Hits" compilation from this seminal, ground-breaking hard rock group is quite off-putting. Folks, I am sorry to say that this one reeks of pure greed — solely on the part of their record company. It all begs one question — Why now?

Admittedly a major fan of Chris Cornell and company, the songs here are near-flawless in both concept (sludgy, slow riffs over Cornell's piercing voice) and execution (crisp and hard-hitting without any grandiose trappings). A-Sides' main problem, besides being a shameless example of crass commercialism, lies in the fact that with a cut-and-paste collection of songs like this, they inevitably lose much of their potency due to the running order. Instead, buy Superunknown. Besides being one of the truly great albums of the decade, it's all the Soundgarden you'll ever need.

While it is fun to hear them progress from Cornell's violent wailings on "Flower" to the admirable vocal restraint of "The Day I Tried to Live," A-Sides simply does not do Soundgarden justice.

The album's only previously unreleased song — and current single — "Bleed Together" certainly is no "A-side." Recorded during the "Down On The Upside" sessions, the song was left off that album, a clear indication that it wasn't among the 16 best tracks that did make it onto the record.

A&M is simply raiding the vaults; I guess their new Blues Traveler release isn't exactly selling like hotcakes. Hey, it's just in time for the holidays too! While the actual music is definitely A worthy reason to purchase this, A-Sides is merely a lame exercise in milking a Dead (cash) cow dry. (Marty Keane)

DOTS AND LOOPS
Stereolab
Elektra

File under easy listening — very easy. Maybe even too easy.

On their ninth LP and fourth major label release, Stereolab's Dots and Loops (Elektra) fails to maintain the progressive musical stylings that have earned them their prolific, indie-status.

Technically, (composition/instrumentation) the LP is flawless. Stereolab's attention to production details pays-off, resulting in virtual walls of sound, which match the masterings of such bands as Spiritualized, My Bloody Valentine or Tortoise (John McEntire was the man in the production studio).

But somewhere between the tour dates and studio sessions, Tim Gane and Laetitia Sadier, the songwriters forgot how to create. French a-la-1960-something-pop/orchestral jazz is dead (and I dare say, boring). As a close friend of mine recently said, "Just because they sing in French, doesn't make them avant-garde."

Sure, their more daring tracks, like "Refractions in the Plastic Pulse" and "Diagonals," tease the listener because they offer a delicious taste of the wonderful, pop-perfection that Sterolab has been in the past on full-lengths such as Emperor Tomato Ketchup and Refried Ecotpliusm.

Dots and Loops is Stereolab's most accessible album to date for a reason — because it has so much mass appeal that its single, "Miss Modular," may be MTV's next Buzz Clip.

Maybe Turn On (a recent Stereolab project which delves further into electronica) stole the greatness from this album, or maybe the top of the college charts is Stereolab's new ambition. C– (Jonathan Liberty)

KING BISCUIT FLOWER HOUR PRESENTING...IGGY POP
Iggy Pop
King Biscuit Records

Trax On Trax Off

Culled from the King Biscuit Flower Hour live concert series, the ought-to-be-legendary Iggy Pop's July 19, 1988 performance from Boston's ill-fated Channel Club is atypical of Pop. In other words, it's a typical incendiary affair as Pop (born James Newell Osterberg) rips through a 17-song set of mostly '80s solo material, with a few Stooges gems thrown in for good measure.

Backed by an impressive array of crack musicians comprised of Andy McCoy (Hanoi Rocks) on guitar, Alvin Gibbs (UK Subs) on bass, Paul Garristo (Psychedelic Furs) on drums and Seamus Beaghen (Madness) on keyboards, the set of songs performed on KBFHP...Iggy Pop (King Biscuit) succeeds in making the connection between his early pre- punk Stooges material and his then-current album, Instinct, which was a bit of a let-down after 1986's David Bowie- produced Blah Blah Blah.

Very rarely do performers come along who can infuse the ridiculous amount of raw, unhindered force that Iggy Pop does. Among the highlights are a surprisingly forgotten "Kill City" and the Stooges classics "1969," "I Wanna Be Your Dog" and "No Fun," a tune routinely covered by the Sex Pistols. Pop excels in writing songs about being bored with nothing to do. He may look like hell, but he proves here that he can rock like Satan's palace as well. A– (M.K.) new, philosophical levels in this classic '80s flick. By far one of the best movies of our time. We all shared his joy as he raced around Chicago in a collector's edition Ferrari, while his pals back at school bonded together to "Save Ferris." He gave high schoolers everywhere something to aspire to. Is it any wonder we turned into Generation X?

8) Synthesizers. Will we ever be able to forget the theme to Beverly Hills Cop? It's doubtful. Enough said.

9) Breakdancing. I don't know what it was all about, but somewhere along the line somebody thought it would be cool to spin around on the floor, and it seemed to catch on. wearing pleather everything, with lots of zippers and bandanas tied everywhere. these guys were cool, um... yeah, totally rad!

10) ATARI. Back in the '80s, it was all about a moving square shooting lines at another moving square, and we called them video games. There were no graphics, there was no NHL '95. It was joysticks and Space Invaders. We didn't need PlayStation to keep us entertained for hours, it was all in the hands of Pacman.

The '80s will be around for a while, kind of like the decade that won't die. As scary a thought as that may be, there still remains a certain mystique about a decade whose catch phrase was "gag me with a spoon." So revel in the cheese, enjoy the shallowness of the days before political correctness was an issue. Go ahead, listen to Pat Benatar, roll your pant legs and get that hair up there, just remember — don't take any of it seriously.

UMass "Pride" Alliance not living up to its title

The Pride Alliance is a group of gay, lesbian and bisexual individuals and their accepting allies. For many of the members of this organization the name is an oxymoron. Pride is, as described by Webster's New College Dictionary, "proper respect for oneself; sense of one's own dignity or worth; self respect."

I attended one of the first Tuesday night gatherings for the Pride Alliance (then called the Lesbian, Bisexual, Gay, Transgender Alliance). There was a fairly large turnout. I attribute this turnout to those who have gone before us in the battle against homophobia. I was feeling proud to be there and participate.

A paper was passed around for individuals to sign, so to speak. The disconcerting part of this little exercise was the fact that there was a column where, if you desired, the LBGTA would be "discrete" when calling. I have always been an advocate of honesty and integrity. I got this from going to church and from my parents during my formative years. (Yes church. Many self-proclaimed Christians have it wrong: God is about love not hate, but that is another issue.)

As an older student who has already dealt with the issue of whether or not to be out, I thought, "Well, they will do what they wish." However, I have not been to another general meeting of this group.

One of the results of the first meeting was a discussion about changing the name of the organization. It was announced that the new name was "Pride Alliance." Excuse me? Pride. I see that, perhaps in my old age, I had forgotten what pride is. I'd better go and check with Mr. Webster. Yep, the definition hadn't changed. So, pride, as it stands to reason, Is something one should display as long as you don't cross over into the realm known as conceit. Make sure you mark me in this column of "discreet." I want to be proud.

Ron Lenker

For the record, I do not condone the outing of individuals. If someone wishes to remain in the closet, that is their prerogative. However, I do not take into exception the individuals who claim to be proud and have pride when they cannot be honest with those around them, or with themselves for that matter. How can an individual have "self respect" if they are living a lie? What kind of "dignity" would make an individual misrepresent his or herself when the subject comes up. Where is the "worth" in denying that someone of the same sex is your partner? Where is the "self respect" in cowering from who you are?

Oh yes, it is really hard in this day and age to be out. Not as difficult as 20 or even five years ago, but it is still hard. There are many ramifications to being out and honest. The possibility of not getting a certain job. It may have happened to me just three weeks ago; I'm not sure. Furthermore, if it did, I do not want to work with a boss who's mind is closed. That closure would hamper progress be it technological or otherwise. Will that stop me? Not on your life!

The possibility of your parents having a fit. They will get over it and if they don't, why would you want someone in your life who doesn't really get over it and love you? Do you really want to have parents that are in love with what they think you are? (Well, maybe, if they are paying for your tuition. Everyone has his or her price!) My parents took it hard too. They still love me and express it in the same way they always have. Sure there was a period of adjustment. Now when I show up without my partner, the first thing my mother says is, "Where is Dan?"

Now for the great part, you know the shame you feel every time you tell the little "white lie." You know, the one about "Michelle" whose name is actually Mike. or "Robert" who happens to be Roberta. There is no need to feel that shame if you are honest. You know how one lie begets another? The way things have a tendency to snowball? Gone, just like that! You will sleep better and be so much happier. Yes, it is really, really hard at first and there are going to be people, even so-called friends, who will turn their back on you. So who needs friends like that anyway?

Only by being out and honest can anyone expect to be accepted. If you know someone who is a liar, regardless of his for her sexuality and you are sure of that fact, I would venture that you would not trust that individual. I wouldn't expect you to. I certainly wouldn't. Furthermore, if that individual lied to you, would they steal from you also?

What other sort of things would they do (or not do for that matter). I am not saying that a liar is also a thief, but I certainly wouldn't want to have them around. So I wonder, why would anyone want to have people around who are not honest? I believe you will find that most people don't care who you love, but they do care if you are honest in your dealings with them.

One of the most interesting things I found out during my process is that it gets easier and easier. Yes, sometimes I may hesitate and rehash it all again, however, honesty is the best policy.

Dealing with homophobia

Homophobia is not something that I experience often. Since I have been at UMass, I can count only two situations where I had homophobia targeted at me. Since the beginning of the semester, the GLBT community has been far more visible than it has been in recent history. The result: heightened harassment.

At the beginning of the semester, I walked in on a work situation where a woman came out as a lesbian. She immediately received a death threat from her co-worker. The supervisor referred to me as "her dyke friend" when I began asking questions. All of this happened right in the Campus Center. As of now, the homophobic worker is still employed there while only having received a very short suspension.

Katie Thoennes

More recently, columnists from the GLBT page in the Collegian have been receiving harassing phone calls. As I walked through the Southwest Area last week, I saw homophobic slurs cast across a window and wall.

This upsurge of ignorance and hate brings up a couple of things for me. One is a direct reaction to the homophobia itself. The other is some questions directed to the GLBT community.

We all know the routine of homophobia: person is insecure, person internalizes self-hate, person targets other people so he/she can feel better about his/her low self- image. My suggestions to you (I do hope you're reading.) are: A) get some help; gay people won't go away, but your homophobia can, and B) get a hobby; we're all busy, who's got time to be a homophobe?

My second reaction is geared towards the GLBT community (myself included). For the most part, it is really easy to be queer in this area. It is comfortable, and that is how It should be. Yet I think the comfort fosters a certain element of inactivity and empathy.

Why didn't I take the time to organize a protest of the Campus Center business which allows its employees to give homophobic death threats and still work there? Why didn't anyone else who saw or heard about it act up?

I didn't because I wasn't the victim. At least not this time. I believe that nothing happens with these acts because, for the most part, we aren't the victims; not directly. But ultimately, we are. It affects me to know that I wasn't the target, but that next time, I might be. It makes me angry, it makes me uncomfortable. Most of all, it makes me sad.

Several years ago, I dated a woman who had been gay- bashed. She still carries scars. She was attacked by a gang because she and her friends looked "too gay." To ignore this and say that it does not affect me is ignorance at its best.

In this area, where I can get by, I am not comfortable enough to be silent. The GLBT community, at times, has been pacified into a comatose-like state of inactivity. When one person gets called a "fag" or a "dyke," it's our responsibility to act up. I'm pissed that homophobia happens and I am not going to shut up.

I believe in change; and I carry the responsibility of improvement. I hope to leave this Earth knowing that I left it better than it was when I came in. I hold myself accountable and I hold others responsible as well. Even though many of us can get by living here in Amherst, we cannot afford silence on any level. We have a responsibility to challenge hate wherever we see it.

What's the use of being out of the closet if we aren't making any noise? Get pissed. Get loud. Make change happen. Queers fight back.

Why tell people anything anyway?

Scenario: December (any year), holidays, family party. Uncle Joe pulls you aside and says, "Soooo, those college boys must be after you! How many boyfriends do you have?" (Annoying laughter from Uncle Joe.) You say, "Well Uncle Joe, I am happily living with my lesbian lover." Uncle Joe drops his plate of cheesecake on your Mom's new living room rug, has a heart attack and everybody gives you that, "Now why did you have to go and do that for?" look.

People ask me why I feel the need to tell people I am queer. My answer to them is that people automatically assume I have a boyfriend or that guys must be knocking down my door. Just because I take an English class doesn't mean I'm an English Major. This reply doesn't seem to cut it though. The next questions are usually: Why do you feel the need to have pride marches? Why can't you just accept it and be on your merry way? Why do you need to throw it in my face? I don't care what you do, just don't do it around me.

Elana Mendelson

Yes, it is a very personal thing and I could keep it to myself. However, if I don't tell anyone, how will I find gay resources, make queer friends, or find a partner? I mean, secret code only goes so far! Me being quiet about who I am is me being ashamed of who I am.

If I get a new job, am I going to keep that to myself? That new job will become a part of me, a new identity I will add to the many other hats I wear in my daily life. We all have many identities: father, daughter, brother, Catholic, Muslim, writer, chemist, philanthropist, etc. No one would have a problem hearing if I were a chemist, which is a personal identity, so why should it matter to hear if I were a homosexual? It is just another way of life.

Pride is really the biggest factor in all this. When I came "out" I wanted to tell everybody I came into contact with. It took me 20 years to figure out who I was and I wanted to tell everybody about my big accomplishment. If we don't have these parades and festivals, we cannot show our unity and pride. We need for others to see we are here and we are not going anywhere. We need those who are still locked in those closets of shame to see we are here and we are proud.

"To Be"
The chosen people are us
The ones who love their fellow man and woman
We struggle to be & deserve to be who we want to be
We were made like any other human being on this earth
But we are not the same
We have to fight harder & be stronger than everyone else
Because we are not attracted to the opposite sex
We find strength in each other
And as we watch our brothers & sisters emerge from the darkness...
Our right to be

Time to end the "–isms"

There is no single "Queer identity" or "Queer community," just one-dimensional stereotypes. Queers are of all socio- economic, racial, ethnic, gender and political backgrounds. The only oppressive force we, as queers, all experience is homophobia, albeit in multiple forms. So, should the queer community just focus on ending homophobia? What about racism, classism and sexism? These "other" oppressions are often labeled coalition issues; and thus, they are transformed into issues separate from the queer community and of lesser importance than homophobia.

Sexism, racism and classism are not issues I work in coalition with, they are my issues. I can't say: "Wouldn't it be nice to work with that group over there who is working against classism?" It's not a choice for me. It is my issue. Note: it is a privilege to "choose" your issues. It is a privilege to be able to "choose" to fight. I am more than just queer. The "Queer Community" is more than just queer.

Brenda Fitzpatrick

Ending homophobia will by no means end oppression. Oppression has many faces, and homophobia is just one. With the increasing number of positive queer media figures, it is becoming increasingly less acceptable to be openly homophobic in the media. Yet, among all the new positive queer characters on TV shows and in movies, they are almost always white and/or middle to upper class.

Like so many others, will we queers who are white and upper class stop fighting once we get a sliver of "privilege pie" put upon our plate? After all, our stomachs are already full from the other privileges we benefit from. In the struggle for our rights, we need to start fighting for and stop accepting scraps. You don't get full or strong from eating scraps. All you get is satiated and pacified like a pig before its slaughter. Rather, we must work to rebuild the dinner table so that we, as living creatures, all receive our equal share.

I want to live in a world where I don't always have to look over my shoulder. A world where I can hold a girl's hand and not have to worry about getting beaten up or asked by someone if they can "watch us get it on." A world where I don't get ignored or glared at in a store if I don't look rich enough. A world where I don't have to worry about trusting male friends. A world where people don't abuse drugs or alcohol because they don't know how to be alive and they think they're not worth anything anyway. A world where people don't tell you you're stupid and beat you up just because of what they see when they look at you. In general, a world without labels and hierarchies of power. I want a lot.

Now, there is a lot of talk in and beyond the queer community about diversity and the need to foster inclusive communities. But no one talks about how to actually do it. How do we create a queer identity based upon heterogony? And once we have done that, how do we work in a heterogeneous community where everyone has different visions of what the queer community should be and what it means to be queer? Most of all, how do we work to end oppression?

I, like so many others, don't have the answers. I am reduced to mere rhetoric with heavy breathing but no clearly defined way of making my proposals a reality. I may be a child, but I will not be a good little girl and sit still In silence waiting for someone else to find the way for me. First off, change begins by learning to respect yourself and others. That's the foundation for change.

Brenda Fitzpatrick is a UMass student.

Papa Says

Papa says don't talk too loud, don't walk too free, don't eat too much.

But Papa don't tell me what to do when she holds my hand and draws pictures on my back.

Papa says don't let anybody beat you at anything, and always be the best.
But Papa don't tell me to calm my heart when she doesn't call. He don't tell me to dry my tears when my mind races.

Papa says right is right, wrong is wrong and sin is sin.

But Papa don't know the electricity that surges through me when I feel her heat on my neck.

Papa don't know exactly what right is, what wrong is, what sin is, or who I am.

Home is where the hate is

I've been thinking a lot about some things that have happened in my dorm this week. I came home after a meeting last Monday night and saw that the bulletin board on my floor which dealt with queer issues had disappeared during the hour and a half of my absence. For about three weeks, it stayed up without incidence. But last Monday, all of the information was gone from the board.

Donnie Roberts

I found this so strange because I am the Resident Assistant on my floor. I would have taken the board down when it was time to put up a new one. I asked some people who were around if they knew or saw anything peculiar, but no one seemed to.

Did this person take the stuff down because they couldn't look at it anymore? Was it too much that there was positive stuff on the wall about being homosexual? Well, I am not sorry that the information was up. I think that it is important that people are exposed to different cultures and lifestyles other than their own. Also, this information may have been able to help some people who are struggling with their own sexual orientation.

Then on Tuesday, my Assistant Resident Director informed me about another act of hate. He showed me newly written homophobic and racist graffiti in the men's bathroom on my floor.

Two days; two different acts of hate where I live.

These two incidences have brought up a lot of feelings for me. I am definitely taking them personally. I should not have to live wondering if the next act will be directed at me. Should I be watching my back? Is this just the beginning of a new wave of hate in my home?

I cannot put my finger on anyone in particular in my building who would think that these acts are an acceptable thing to do. Everyone seems so cool. But someone among my neighbors apparently can't deal with living in a place where educational information about "coming out" is on the wall. Someone among my neighbors feels like hate graffiti needs to be written on the walls. I don't want to believe that someone that I live with probably hates me for being gay. How do I know that it is not the person I just exchanged "hellos" with when we crossed in the hallway?

Now, I feel less sure about how much to trust the people that I live with. I should be able to feel totally comfortable being who I am in my home. But how can I find comfort when hate is rearing its ugly head?

Sometimes I wish that the people who take action with hate would sign their names and could be held accountable for what they do. It sure would make things easier. At least then I could try to have a discussion with them and share my thoughts about exactly why homophobia is not cool.

So, these incidents have caused me to return to an understanding that homophobia can and will affect me for the rest of my life. I cannot escape it. Wherever I go, there are going to be people who do things that are rooted in ignorance. I refuse to go back into the closet and ignore these things. Acts of homophobia need to be identified so that people get the message that they are not acceptable.

Building a meal with Ramen

Dormroom Gourmet
by Louis Davis

I have to start this week's column with a correction and an apology. If you spied last week's recipe for Pumpkin and Shrimp Curry, you might have noticed the lack of a key ingredient — the pumpkin! Well, it somehow got lost in translation. It should have appeared in the list of ingredients in between the lemon juice and the chicken broth. The recipe calls for no can of pumpkin flesh (again, not that pie filling stuff!). Simple enough, right? Hey, no scorn or blame allowed.

On to this week's theme: The old reliable — the package of Ramen noodles. It is, without a doubt, one of the most essential staples of a dorm room existence. There is nothing better for a quick meal, especially before (or after) a long night of keg stands. Unfortunately, old reliable can turn into "not that again" very quickly — unless, that is, you give it a tweak and treat it as a component of a fully balanced Asian meal. For about $3 or $4 and a little of your precious time, you can have a killer feast. Also, it's easy to make enough to feed a hungry pack or keep you nourished for a good couple of days.

This dorm room recipe for lo-mein is made using creative substitutions for a lot of the specialty ingredients usually found in more "authentic" versions. I think you'll find it smokes just the same. And, as I am compelled by my conscience (and "Big Brother") to say, whenever and wherever you're cooking, think safety (and flavor) first. Always have a fire extinguisher close by and be sure to provide for proper ventilation. Rock and boil!

Louie's Loaded Lo-Mein

Ingredients:
2 packages Ramen style noodles
3 Tbs. vegetable oil (not olive oil — its "smoking point" is too low and will burn under the crazy high heat of the stir-fry)
2 eggs, beaten
2 tsp. minced garlic (fresh or prepared)
2 tsp. minced ginger (fresh or prepared)
1/2 Lb. "protein" (you can use a piece of steak meat, boneless chicken breast, pork loin, shrimp, tofu or tempeh — or a combo to your liking) all (but shrimp) cut into thin, narrow strips (referred to as julienne) about 1/4 inch by 1/4 inch by 1 & 1/2 to 2 inches long
2 quarter-inch thick slices of baked deli ham, julienned (optional)
1/2 cup broccoli (stems julienne and florets cut into bite-sized pieces)
1/2 cup red bell pepper, julienned
1/2 cup carrots, shredded or cut into match stick sized strips (carrot is very dense and will not cook properly unless cut this thin)
4 scallions (green onions), green parts only, chopped diagonally (on the bias) into 1 inch pieces

For Sauce:
1 cup "Ramen broth" (explanation included later in recipe)
1/4 cup soy sauce
1 Tbs. Worcestershire sauce
2 tsp. Dijon mustard
2 tsp. ketchup
1 Tbs. honey or sugar
2 tsp. sesame oil
1 Tbs. corn starch
1 tsp. pepper (pref. white)
1 tsp. red pepper flakes (optional)

Procedure:

1) Bring four cups of water to a boil and cook noodles until just pliable (they are going to cook more later, so don't overcook). Reserve one cup of the hot water and then drain and rinse under very cold water (this is called "shocking" and it stops the cooking process). Put the noodles aside and toss with the sesame oil (or substitute with vegetable oil). In a bowl, mix the hot water into one of the seasoning packets, stir to thoroughly dissolve and allow to cool. Mix together the rest of the sauce ingredients in a separate container.

2) Place a wok or a large skillet over medium heat, allow to heat up, add 1 Tbs. of the oil and scramble the eggs. When cooked through, remove from pan and set aside.

3) Turn the heat up to high, add the remaining oil and add the garlic and ginger, stirring often until you can smell the aromas. Next add your protein of choice and the ham (if using). Stir constantly for two minutes or until mostly

Uncle Sam explores dark issues

FOUR COLOR COMMENTARY by Jeff Carter

Hey folks, welcome to another Four Color Commentary, your source for what's happening in the comic industry. Before we dive into this week's reviews, I need your help on a little survey I'm conducting. I want all of you comic readers with access to computers to send me an e-mail at Scribe1974@aol.com, and tell me what you think is the greatest comic story ever produced. It can be a graphic novel, a single-issue story, a miniseries, or perhaps even a crossover. I'll tally up the results and publish them along with my own thoughts in a future column. Now, onto the reviews:

Uncle Sam #1 (DC/Vertigo, $4.95)
Writer: Steve Darnall Artist: Alex Ross

"I want out. Clad in star-spangled rags, a man named Sam wanders the streets of an anonymous American city, struggling to remember his true identity. But he's plagued by voices that carry him on a time-traveling journey to the dark heart of America...and hint at his own violent past. Is he Uncle Sam, or one of U.S.?" So reads the back cover of this latest thought provoking offering from DC's Vertigo line. Well, perhaps "thought-provoking" isn't a strong enough adjective to describe this new two-issue prestige- format series. It's an intensely dark, sardonic, hard-hitting commentary on the evils that exist in our country on all levels, or at least it tries to be. The first issue is a bizarre tapestry of powerful images and rambling narratives, assaulting you with a barrage of obvious and cryptic examples of how America is a lost, corrupt society politically and socially. Through violent flashbacks, Sam recalls being present through atrocities such as massacres during the American Revolution, the lynching of a black slave, the last stand of the great Native American Black Hawk in Illinois, and in the most powerful section of the comic, President Kennedy's assassination in 1963. During a bloody montage of the shooting brilliantly painted by Ross, Darnall writes: "ask not what your country has done for you, but what your country has done to you." A chilling and thought-provoking twist on Kennedy's famous speech. Towards the end of the book, after attending a campaign rally for an unscrupulous senator, Sam seems to remember his true identity when a false Uncle Sam tells him: "you used to be somebody, now you're nothing" (obviously a double meaning, since America isn't what it used to be either). Sam then realizes he must set things right and return the country to greatness, but the question still plagues him, was America that great to begin with? Uncle Sam is not an easy comic to read, oftentimes it becomes incoherent and drifts away from its focus, but it does its job effectively nonetheless. It will have you questioning the decisions this country has made in the past, and the relevance they have in today's society. In short, it will make you think. Something a lot of comics out there just don't accomplish. The fully-painted artwork by Alex Ross (Kingdom Come) is gorgeous and, as always, is reason enough alone to buy this book. But don't buy it just because it's Ross... buy it to make yourself think.

Fantastic Four #1 (Marvel #2.99) Writer: Scott Lobdell Artist: Alan Davis

The first of the four "Heroes Reborn" titles to return the Marvel characters back to regular continuity has our favorite superhero family called out to Paris to investigate yet another "dimensional disturbance." The trouble turns out to be a race of beings from another dimension called "The Ruined" who select a young environmental activist to be their leader and set out to "cleanse and purify" the Earth. This was a disappointing first effort for the new creative team of Lobdell and Davis. It was a standard, cliched Fantastic Four adventure with a preachy moral lesson about pollution and greedy corporations ravaging the planet thrown in for some reason. It's not that this issue was terrible, it's just that it wasn't very good either. The characters were handled reasonably well, the art was very nice and it was good to see the Thing yelling "It's clobberin time!" again. However, the big problem I had with the comic was the fact that it made no effort to tie in with the Heroes Reborn: The Return miniseries. In the last issue of that, we saw the Fantastic Four fall to Earth when the starship they were traveling in from the Heroes Reborn world exploded after crashing through the dimensional border. FF#1 immediately shows the group at a secret base in the Antarctic. Where did this base come from? How did the FF gain back their memories? Do they still remember the Heroes Reborn world? What happened when they tried to return to Four Freedoms Plaza and saw that it was occupied by the Thunderbolts? These are important questions that Lobdell simply avoided, but addressing them would've made for an infinitely more captivating comic book than this mediocre outing. My advice is to save your cash for the return of Mark Waid and Ron Garney on Captain America #1 shipping this week. C

Oceans of Times best album of 1997?

Okay, jazz fans, you've read me giving praise to this disc, that disc and the other disc, and have read my criticisms of more lackadaisical efforts, but this time I believe jazz has found its definitive recording, at least for 1997.

Oceans Of Time by drummer Billy Hart (Arabesque) has so much of what makes good jazz: groove-based phrasing, abstract compositions that take on high-degree performance in different parts and combinations, emotive timbre (or, tone coloring) and a disc that is well-produced and has a disturbingly perfect song sequence that seems almost natural. That is, natural in a way that if it were in any other order, it would not be the mind-bending work that it is.

Joining veteran drummer Hart (whose work from the '60s on has been heard with artists ranging from Herbie Hancock's Mwandishi group, Antonio Carlos Jobim, Eddie Harris and too many more to list) are saxophonists John Stubblefield and Chris Potter, violinist Mark Feldman, pianist David Kikoski, bassist Santi Debriano, and guitarist David Fiuczynski.

Together, this septet dives right into Stubblefield's "One For Carter" with a vengeance. This tune features one of the most intensely laid-out drum solos on the album. Listening on, you will reach "Teule's Redemption."

A walk-through, if you will follow along: Quiet, open beginning, with fast bass figures squirming around the space. The musicians play randomly, but it is all doomed to come together into a stirring mixture that is at once somber and fast-paced. Feldman states the creepy theme on violin as Horace Silver looks at the safety of "be-bop" — the '50s style which he helped invent.

■ jazz

the ensemble supports and responds to him.

Each instrumentalist in their solos on "Teulé's Redemption" desires to break the bonds of time (and the recording studio), but are held back in the thought that their comrades also have something meaningful to "say." When it all ends, you are left with both an overwhelmed mind and a feeling of glory.

Then you look at the CD case and realize there are six more mental cannonballs to come, among the best of which are "Shadow" (wherein Hart gives different rhythm and timbre to each instrument's solo, bringing to mind the soloists' individuality), "Mindreader" (just the title alone is enough to send a chill up the spine — great bass/drum duet right in the middle of this one) and the last tune "Offering," by Debriano, which showcases one last time the fact that so much talent on one disc should be illegal for what it does to even the most devoted of jazz listeners. Best Jazz Album of '97? So far, yes, I'd say.

Woah. Now how will any of the other discs I comment on follow that one? Well, we have another veteran from even further back in jazz history (the '50s), this being pianist Horace Silver whose '50s work probably got praised at the time for its soulful originality as Oceans Of Time did above. Not that he's lost his piano skills. His chord runs still shout with a gospel-like joy on the new Impulse! recording A Prescription For The Blues, yet his compositions ground safely in the dominant style of the '50s, "hard-bop," which Silver (along with Sonny Rollins and a couple others) basically invented.

Michael and Randy Brecker (sax and trumpet, respectively), Ron Carter on bass and Lewis Nash help out Silver on his follow-up to 1995's successful The Hard-Bop Grandpop. "Whenever Lester Plays The Blues" plays off the Gershwins' "It Ain't Necessarily So" and "Free At Last" resonates with a declarative theme and solos by all. Not bad.

Other releases recently include that of Andy Summers, former Police guitarist, on his RCA/Victor album, The Last Dance Of Mr. X, which brings back Summers' chorus-effected sound, with King Crimson's Tony Levin lending rolling, smooth bass and Greg Bissonette's fine, encompassing drum style on board as well. This trio dips into rock, and early Mahavishnu Orchestra-type of fusion for a fine mix by a guitarist whose sound is integrated into pop through his association with Sting and Stew Copeland.

What doesn't work so well (yet does have its funky bright spots) is Brian Tarquin's Last Kiss Goodbye with the This Is Acid Jazz label on it, which tries to mix London acid-jazz (a la Brand New Heavies) and the fusion of Jeff Beck and John McLaughlin with an American edge. Problem is, he left the edge somewhere behind on his way to the studio, and things came out a wee bit too "smooth." Tarquin definitely has talent and if you dig your jazz with a drum machine and synths, you won't be disappointed. Like to see him in a live group setting, like on "One Arabian Night" and "Third Stone From The Sun" by Hendrix, the two real interesting tunes on this disc (which skirts Kenny G-dom). Now that's scary.

4) Add all the veggies (except the scallions) and stir fry until they are "crisp-tender."

5) Add the noodles to the pan and toss well allowing them to reheat and fry a little. Break up the reserved scrambled egg into bite sized pieces and add to the pan.

6) Mix together the cooled Ramen broth and the sauce mixture and add to the skillet. Allow to the sauce to boil and thicken (which it will do because of the cornstarch) and toss well with the rest of the ingredients in the pan. At the last minute, add the scallions, toss well, remove from pan and begin chowing!

Snockgrass a relaxed groove listen

We've got a whole batch of new releases in the acoustic pantheon this week, so let's get right to them, starting with a few from our lovely neighbors in Cambridge, Mass., Rounder Records.

Doing Our Job is the live product of a December 1996 live run in the Midwest by multi-instrumentalists John McCutcheon and Tom Chapin (also singer/songwriters — busy men, eh?). While their tunes may be redundant in their ideas of righteousness between all humans, growing up over the hill and the foolishness on television news these days, some songs are truly resonant of fine musicianship and singing.

Woody Guthrie's "Pastures Of Plenty," McCutcheon's "Dead Man Walking" (inspired by Sister Helen Prejean's book of the same name which Tim Robbins made into a great movie last year), and the nice young-love romance of McCutcheon & Chapin's "Heaven Help" all succeed in doing their job of entertaining even the casual listener.

Even better than Doing Our Job is the re-issue of singer/songwriter Michael Hurley's 1980 Snockgrass (Rounder) album, with music that is not nearly as riotous and humorously profane as the disc cover, but instead sinks into a relaxed late-night acoustic groove. Songs like "O My Stars," with its stunning vocal harmonies by Hurley and Jill Gross, and others with more deadpan humor like "Sweet Lucy" and "I Heard The Voice Of A Porkchop" convince me that New England certainly had a real treasure in its hands with this Vermont native.

And, finally, for the Rounder discs is the compilation called Coal Mining Women. This disc takes recordings done over the last 20 or so years mostly by female bluegrass artists like Hazel Dickens, the Reel World String Band and Sarah Gunning, all on the topic of the biggest industry in the Appalachian sections of West Virginia and Kentucky.

Since coal mining has long been one of the most dangerous occupations a person could have, many of these songs are sad recollections of either individual accidents or the whole deadly history of coal workers. Dickens' "The Mannington Mine Disaster" is especially poignant on that topic. There are also more upbeat songs praising the hard- working men and women in the occupation and protest songs concerning benefits for the workers.

Out now on Sugar Hill Records is the "newgrass" project, Chesapeake's latest album Pur Pressure. Mixing contemporary country sounds with bluegrass and singer- songwriter ethics, the band, led by main songwriter T. Michael Coleman, moves through songs that are blessed with splendid harmonies (Linda Rondstadt contributes to one song), and virtuosic instrumentation on both acoustic and electric instruments. Their songs address love, destiny and generally living life to its fullest — some of these ideas are treated originally while some aren't, but the lyrics take a back seat to the instrumental vigor of the quartet.

From the '50s, we have two collections of folk re-issued on another Massachusetts-based label: Rykodisc's Tradition subsidiary. Instrumental Music Of The Southern Appalachians is a collection of 1956 field recordings in Virginia and North Carolina. Multi-instrumentalist Hobart Smith fiddles and plays banjo on several tracks (all tracks are traditional, passed down from generations past) with finesse, while Etta Baker plucks acoustic and resophonic guitar to a stately, ringing result on "Railroad Bill" and "Goin' Down The Road Feelin' Bad" (yes, Deadheads, it is the same tune). Other tunes are spun off from dulcimer and harmonica, all bringing to mind the green peaks of the region from which these recordings were made.

Odetta's At The Gate Of Horn is our other Tradition re- issue and was her second album, and her first with accompaniment (Bill Lee — Spike's father — lends acoustic bass accompaniment). Odetta's broad voice sweeps through "The Lass Of The Low Country," "Midnight Special" and moves along the humorous fairy tale effects of "The Fox" with equal effect. Again, all the songs on At The Gate Of Horn are basically acoustic traditionals that Odetta fans like Bob Dylan did their best to carry on into their own music and thus carried over into our own generation.

Garth Fagan Dance Troupe to reveal aesthetic brillance

By Emily Trask
Collegian Staff

The Garth Fagan Dance Troupe will bring a thrilling evening of performance to Amherst. Now in its 26th year, this extraordinary company has gained tremendous recognition over the years for its dynamic choreography and aesthetic brilliance.

Garth Fagan Dance resonates with the philosophy and stylistic essence of its Founder and Artistic Director, Garth Fagan, who has developed a vivid dance form that is a synergy of modern, jazz, Afro-Caribbean and ballet traditions. The Garth Fagan Dance Company will perform at the Fine Arts Center tonight at 8 p.m.

The themes of his choreographed pieces spring from the stories and musical traditions of different cultures and experiences.

The evening will open with the prelude Discipline is Freedom, the company's showcase set to music by Abdullah Ibrahim and Max Roach. This piece reveals the various eclectic idioms that contribute to the Garth Fagan dance style and capture in its title the spirit and motto of the company itself.

Three Post Cards consists of a suite of three dances including Post Cards: Pressures and Possibilities set to the music of Roots II by David N. Baker. The company will also perform to the music of The Preservation Hall Jazz Band in the crowd pleaser Touring-Jubilee 1924. The mini- epic Nkanyit with Here, There, Family, and Tomorrow is a masterpiece of movement and refers to the Samburu tradition of revering life, ancestors, elders, children and each other.

The evening will conclude with the uncompromising Garth Fagan classic Griot New York, which emerged out of groundbreaking collaboration with Wynton Marsalis and New York sculptor Martin Puryear. This dynamic performance celebrates New York in all its beauty and squalor.

Garth Fagan formed the Company in 1970 in Rochester, New York, where from the very beginning the artistic significance of his work has been inextricably bound with the diverse character of American culture. The themes of his choreographed pieces spring from the stories and musical traditions of different cultures and experiences. His dancers, too, are unmatched in their originality, unmannered approach and virtuosity.

Tickets for the performance can be purchased by calling the Fine Arts Center Box Office at (413)545-2511 or 1-800- call-UMAS. Ticket prices are $30, $25, $15 for adults. $8 for children 17 and under, and $5 for Five College students.

Ethan Hawke discusses his latest underdog role in Gattaca

By Amy Selwyn
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Ethan Hawke has absolutely no future. That is, unless he can fool people into believing his genetic composition is, well, perfect.

Ethan Hawke? No future? Sounds ridiculous, doesn't it?

Don't tell that to Andrew Niccol, the New Zealand screenwriter/director who has cast Hawke in the sci-fi thriller, Gattaca, Hawke plays Vincent Freeman, a "faith birth"— or nonengineered individual— in a society where progeny are designed in petri dishes, diseases are eliminated and more desirable traits are engineered into the population. Faith births are only suited for janitorial work.

In an interview, the 26-year old Hawke talked about Gattaca, gene pools, perfection, the Dalai Lama and magazine covers.

"All of us have been told we can't do things we want to do," says Hawke. "It's the whole question of whether or not we can find the strength to go ahead and believe in ourselves."

Man, not as Superman, but as Underdog — that's what drew Hawke to the Gattaca project. The actor says he wanted to explore the question of how individuals realize dreams in the face of overwhelming odds.

And this busy actor, whose credits include critical successes like Dead Poet's Society, A Midnight Clear and Reality Bites, says he's quite familiar with the underdog role.

Hawke was born in Austin, Texas, then moved to Princeton, N.J., as a young boy. He started taking acting classes at Princeton's McCarter Theater, landing his first professional acting job at age 13 in George Bernard Shaw's Saint Joan. Hawke's screen debut followed shortly when he was cast at 14 in the film Explorers.

He's been working steadily since then, though Hawke says it hasn't been smooth sailing.

"I've had my share of people telling me I'm absolutely no good at all. I've got those stories," Hawke admits, laughing. "I went in for a soap opera, and the person at the soap opera called my agent and asked, 'Why would you send such an untalented, snotty little creature in here?'

Brightman makes her own way

By Matt Wolf
Associated Press

LONDON — First, you notice the hair, the impossibly long extensions falling almost to the waist that supplements what would otherwise be a close-to-the-ears bob showing off those saucer-like eyes.

Then there's the voice, a multioctave trill that admirers find thrilling and detractors dismiss as a pseudo-classical warble.

And let us not forget the audience members — many of them on this occasion German, just as many middle-aged — who arrived to cheer Sarah Brightman, a singer once famous as Andrew Lloyd Webber's wife and the star of Phantom of the Opera, but who is now going it alone.

"I'm an artist who is moving on to other things," Brightman was saying one recent day, not 24 hours after she had brought a Royal Albert Hall crowd of some 4,500 to its feet.

In the past, Brightman's public has been a West End and Broadway one. A former singer-dancer with the group Hot Gossip, she appeared in the chorus of the original London production of Cats and later married the show's composer, Lloyd Webber, appearing in his song cycle Song and Dance.

His very own "angel of music," Lloyd Webber wrote the part of Christine Daae in The Phantom of the Opera for his new bride, threatening to cancel the Broadway run in 1988 if Brightman was not allowed to transfer with it from London alongside Michael Crawford. She took over the female lead in her husband's Aspects of Love, but Brightman by then was preparing to move on — out of both the marriage and out of musical theater in an attempt to refashion herself as a classical chanteuse.

Now on a German concert tour, and with the release of the Time to Say Goodbye album in the United States, the 37-year-old Brightman is striving to distinguish herself from the silver-voiced soubrette who married a millionaire.

"Right from the beginning, Andrew said about me that I was a talent in my own right," said Brightman, eyes widening with sincerity, "and the reason he wrote for me was because I was a talent and he loved my voice and he said, 'Without me, Sarah would do things anyway.'

"In a way, everything he said now that I'm apart from him and doing my own thing is coming to fruition," she said. "I'm doing what I always wanted — building my own niche."

A divorce settlement reported at $10 million has no doubt helped, but Brightman insists she never was one to live off the loot: "I'm not going to say money doesn't mean anything. It makes the world go round; there has to be a flow of money."

And yet, she said, "It has not been my goal in life to have lots of money. My pleasure comes from doing what I do, and I'd get very sick if I couldn't do that. I'm just naturally a very creative person, and I have to get that all out of my system."

You believe Brightman when she suggests a performer's life as Mrs. L. W. was no bed of roses, even if she won better reviews on Broadway as Rose Vibert in Aspects than she ever did in Phantom.

Reviewing the earlier show, then-New York Times chief critic Frank Rich compared Brightman to a chipmunk. Even now, the barbsstick, with Britain's Daily Express newspaper this month referring to "Sarah's fundamental pointlessness."

"I was sheltered, obviously, in a way with Andrew because of all of the things he had and the people looking after us, but in away that made me more exposed," she said.

"I couldn't just stand there and be vulnerable and say, 'Hey, I'm just a girl who has a flat down the road,' because, of course, people say, 'Well, you're so lucky: you're married to the composer.'

"Of course, I was making my mistakes in public, and that was being branded all over the papers," she said. "Psychologically, that really threw my confidence. I have to fight it all the time."

Looking back on the Phantom phenomenon, she said, "It was not a positive time; but to the general public it was an incredibly positive time because look at what Phantom became, has done, and what it's going to do in the future."

"We had to go through a lot of problems, but that happens to everyone at some point," Brightman said. "At least what came out of it was an enormous big hit and something that will go on for a long time and give a lot of people pleasure — even though I didn't have a lot of pleasure doing it."

Brightman's current beau of six years is record producer Frank Peterson, whose German home she now shares, though the performer keeps a London flat and a "really peaceful place surrounded by farmers and countryside" 20 minutes outside Milan, Italy.

"I have another life now. I have my own thing going all over the world."

Hey, I may be a Patriots fan, but I'm also a realist.

How about Boomer Esaison's performance against the hapless Colts on Sunday? The southpaw led Cincinnati to two second half touchdowns in relief of Jeff Blake to propel the Bengals to their third win of the year.

Oh, and about those Colts, they're getting really pitiful (as if they weren't terrible already). They brought in Kerwin Bell and former Heismann trophy winner Gino Torretta to try to stop the bleeding against Green Bay. That wound is going to stay nice and fresh this week, and possibly for the rest of what will probably be an 0–16 season. You know, at least they'll get a real quarterback in Peyton Manning with the number one pick.

Unlike Luke, I am not fortunate enough to have an Uncle Bill (I do have an Uncle Bob and an Uncle Anthony), but I do have a Majokey and a Merola. Majokey (yes, that's his nickname) and Merola (a.k.a. Sillas — it's a long story about a strip club) are the kind of kids that you were friends with in high school that everyone made fun of but really liked deep inside.

So I called both of them this week but neither of them were home. Therefore, I am without their precious predictions for their inaugural segment.

Instead, I'll give you my predictions: Patriots over the Bucs, Baltimore over Philadelphia and Indianapolis over Green Bay (just kidding).

and several people who would be far happier at the corner of Second Ave. and St. Mark's Place, in the epicenter of New York's East Village, than any place in the 413 area code.

Advantage: Amherst

The Alumni Cup: The final word and the ultimate hockey measuring stick. UMass didn't want to get involved until it got its feet on the ground, but was pressured into the series starting in 1995–96, as a third year program, against a Lowell team that went to the NCAA quarterfinals after a big win at Michigan State. Now, UMass has won both cups, but has its work cut out for it in a quest for a third. UMass must defeat the River Hawks tomorrow, and again on Feb. 8, or risk rearranging the Mullins Center trophy case. Still the Minutemen have won it twice to date 0–...

Advantage: Amherst

So, you see, after falling behind 2–1 and 4–3, UMass gets some late goals to rally and win the battle both on the ice tomorrow and off it today, 6–4 with an empty–netter, to set up an early February winner–take–all tussle for the third straight year.

would be expected of her in September. In time, she was able to cautiously join her teammates in regular practices, but there was still work to be done.

Some weeks later, on Sept. 20 at Vermont, Rebecca Donaghue placed fourth overall and second on the team with a time of 18:43. It had taken over four months, but the record holder had gone from being in crippling pain that made walking a problem to competing with the conference's best. By the time the Atlantic 10 championships came on Nov. 1, Donaghue was running at full speed.

And so she and the Minutewomen got down in the pouring rain just prior to race time. Donaghue subsequently went out and became the second woman in history to win a second conference title, adding to her legacy, which includes being the first UMass woman to qualify for nationals, a feat she has accomplished since she was a sophomore two years ago. Her exciting victory after such a trying rehabilitation tightened Donaghue's grasp on cross country immortality.

Of all people though, Rebecca Donaghue cared perhaps the least about her personal accolades — especially in comparison with the team victory, this year's being the third in three years.

"She's not a cocky individual," said Martin. "She doesn't like to be recognized by herself in front of the whole team. She's quiet and laid back, certainly more in it for the team than for herself."

After a glorious day in the rain in Virginia, Donaghue and her teammates celebrated in the most appropriate way possible.

"After the race," said Donaghue, "we went sliding in the mud."

Blazers jump start season at 5–1

By Bob Baum
Associated Press

PORTLAND, Ore. — The Portland Trail Blazers sure are feeling good about themselves.

Those testy troublemakers of yore are a picture of poise and harmony on a five-game winning streak.

At 5-1, their best start since 1992, the Blazers share the lead in the Pacific Division with the Los Angeles Lakers and Seattle SuperSonics.

"I feel like this right now is the best time of my career," said the Blazers' maestro Kenny Anderson. "I feel so good about the chances here. I trust everybody in this locker room. When you have trust with your teammates, being a point guard, you feel that much better."

The Blazers might be 6-0 if not for Anderson's sore ankle and Isaiah Rider's troubled past. Neither played in the season opener against Seattle, a 91-83 Portland loss. The Blazers have not lost since.

Anderson, who missed nearly all of the preseason because of a sprained left ankle, has scored 20, 24, 24, 28 and 29 in Portland's winning streak. He had 11 assists to go with his 29 points in an 86-82 win over Detroit Monday night, a game in which he brought the Blazers back from a 12-point halftime deficit by scoring 15 in the final quarter.

"These are definitely all-star numbers," Portland coach Mike Dunleavy said. "And it's not even numbers because statistics don't tell the story of what kind of shots he's making, coming up with big plays when we really need them."

Many thought Anderson had his best season last year, his first in Portland.

"I'm going to have a better one, I think," Anderson said. "I don't like predictions, but it feels good."

Monday's victory marked the third time in four tries that Portland has trailed after three quarters and won.

"Great character, great firepower," Rider said. "A lot of those games, I've come through and had a big third quarter or fourth quarter, as well as Kenny. We know we have good offensive power.

"To get down, to get upset when you're down five or seven points is ridiculous, when you know that can be a three-minute turnaround."

Except for a missed practice, an offense Dunleavy shrugged off with a $1,000 fine, Rider has been notable for his basketball rather than his off-court meanderings.

After returning from his two-game NBA suspension to open the season, he averaged 22 points over four games before he dipped to 12 against Detroit. Still, he had nine in a crucial third-quarter comeback and has taken up Dunleavy's challenge to become a defensive specialist.

The old man among the youngsters, Arvydas Sabonis, who turns 33 next month, has had four consecutive double-doubles in points and rebounding and his injury-worn legs look fresher than they have since his first few months in the NBA two years ago.

The highly paid frontline of Rasheed Wallace and Brian Grant, both power forwards by nature, is still a work in progress, with Wallace usually playing small forward and Grant doing the dirty work on the boards, where he's averaging 11 rebounds a game. Off the bench are a mix of veterans and youngsters in John Crotty, Stacey Augmon, Jermaine O'Neal, Vincent Askew and Kelvin Cato. Gary Trent will figure in the equation when he returns from a shin injury.

Dunleavy, a welcome change from the intense P.J. Carlesimo, gets much of the credit from the players.

"He's great for our ball club," Anderson said. "He's real loose. He lets the guys have a lot of input. He's detailed and knows what he wants. It's great for our team. I'm happy with this whole situation.

Woods, Leonard led tales of success in 1997 PGA season

By Ron Sirak
Associated Press

– A season that started as a solitary portrait of Tiger Woods ended as a complex collage in tribute to the depth of talent on the PGA Tour. The images that linger should be pasted in a scrapbook - 1997 was a keeper.

The warmth of Tiger's smile and the determination of Justin's scowl. The elegance of Ernie's swing and the magic of Davis' rainbow.

The exuberance of European Ryder Cup fans.

Memories of Hogan.

Woods brought unprecedented attention to golf, but the game produced the moments that made the year memorable.

The season started with Woods' near hole-in-one to beat Tom Lehman at the Mercedes Championships, setting off a Tiger frenzy that continued through his 12-stroke victory at the Masters and follow-up win at the Byron Nelson Classic.

"If Mickelson won four tournaments last year," Woods said about the possibility of winning the Grand Slam. "It's just a matter of winning the right four."

But after winning three of his first eight tournaments this year and shooting in the 60s in 20 of his first 34 rounds, Woods was victorious once in his final 12 starts and shot in the 60s only 15 times in 47 rounds.

"Realistically, it's next to impossible to win all four," Woods said in August when asked again about the Grand Slam. "How about just being in contention."

One indelible memory was the exquisite tempo of Ernie Els' swing on his 5-iron on the 71st hole at the U.S. Open, a swing that had all the urgency of someone hitting balls on the practice range. The purity of that swing was matched only by the look of anguish on Lehman's face as his 7-iron second shot on the same hole bounded into the water.

"I'd give anything in the world for a mulligan," Lehman said after Els won.

After the 21-year-old Woods won the Masters and Els, 27, won the U.S. Open, it seemed only fitting that Justin Leonard, 25, would win the British Open.

With his hat stitched with the word "Hogan" pulled tightly against the British breeze at Royal Troon, Leonard attacked the course with a face that never betrayed anything except concentration.

The key shot came on the 71st hole when he made a 35-foot birdie putt to take the lead for the first time all week, pulling one ahead of Jesper Parnevik.

"I just knew from about 3 feet out that it was right in the center of the hole," Leonard said. "That's when the hair on the back of my neck stood up."

Shortly after returning home to Texas, Leonard received a handwritten congratulations note from Ben Hogan. The note took on even greater meaning on July 25 - five days after the British Open - when Hogan died.

The sorrow at Hogan's passing gave way to the pure joy of hearing stories told and retold about the greatest shotmaker the game has ever known.

An eerie replication of the magical link between Leonard and Hogan occurred the next month when Davis Love III won his first major title at the PGA Championship, a tournament played several times by his father, a teaching pro who first exposed his son tothe game and who died in a 1988 plane crash. "The son of a PGA member," Love said just moments after he walked beneath a glorious rainbow onto the final green at Winged Foot. "Who would have thought?"

Love, Leonard and Woods took only 2 1/2 of a possible 13 points at the Ryder Cup and Europe won 14 1/2-13 1/2 at Valderrama in Spain. The pain felt by the Americans was matched by the exhilaration of European captain Seve Ballesteros.

"It's a dream come true, not only because the Ryder Cup was played in Spain but because we won," said Ballesteros, who fought to bring the Ryder Cup to his homeland.

Change should add up; 'Noles still in the hunt

Ever since I was a youngster watching the NBA, I've loved Charles Barkley. I enjoyed his in-your-face attitude and his call–it–as–I–see–it way of going about things. I thought too many pro athletes spent too much time polishing their image by saying what everybody wants to hear so they can win the Man of the Year award. Chuck was different.

However, a few weeks ago, the Round Mound of Rebound went and finally made himself too conservative for me to handle. Barkley told reporters that not only should women not be NBA referees or in the military, but that their place was "behind their man." Thank you, Newt Gingrich. I thought I would have to check history books to get an ideal that fascist.

Seth Koenig

The only real question here is whether or not Chuck's wife, Maureen Barkley, has allowed him to stop sleeping on the coach yet...

While on the subject of pro basketball, I will make one early season prediction: Anfernee Hardaway will be the league's Most Valuable Player come season's end. His switch over to shooting guard for the Orlando Magic will give him more freedom to improvise, and we'll see Penny give Michael Jordan some serious competition for the scoring title as a result. Just look what happened late last year when he played 2 guard. The man dominated games the way MJ and Hakeem Olajuwon have been known to. Mark my words, Penny will be MVP.

In the world of boxing, Evander Holyfield has done it again. The Real Deal just continues to batter contenders one after another. Lennox Lewis is next in line after Holyfield slugged the crap out of Michael Moorer this past weekend. I would like to personally extend a thanks to Evander for being able to brutally beat up on people inside the ring without brutally beating up on people outside the ring. Some of his contemporaries haven't figured that out yet, unfortunately. Usually the perpetrators of "extra–curricular" activities are under the belt of Don King; Mike Tyson being the obvious, prime example. What does this say about the man with the big hair? Nothing that we don't know already or that Andrew Dice Clay hasn't said in one of his stand–up routines.

On to the next subject, now. I have been a die–hard Patriots fan since I could possibly be a die–hard fan of anything (except, perhaps eating and sleeping and things like that). However, their slamming of the Bills in Buffalo does not have me convinced that the Pats are back on track. Let's face it, New England always plays the Bills well, and without Jim Kelly, those guys aren't legitimate contenders. Against teams that don't let the ballboy play quarterback, the Patriots have an extremely hard time, and even when the ballboy is taking the snaps (the Jets), the red, white and blue struggle sometimes. I love them, but they need to beat somebody with a pulse to win my confidence back. They get a chance next week against the Buccaneers in Tampa Bay.

Down at the college level, my AP vote (if I actually had one) goes to Florida State and their underappreciated quarterback, Thad Busby. Yes, I am a big Seminoles fan, and yes, I have been waiting a long time to be able to justify calling them No. 1, but now I think it's true. If the AP poll is so interested in overwhelming whuppings of pathetic teams, like Nebraska has been doing all year long, then Florida State's overwhelming whuppings of solid teams should bode well for them. Bobby Bowden's Noles dominated fifth ranked North Carolina this weekend, proving again that they're in the hunt for a national title. Also, last week's No. 1, the Cornhuskers, just barely beat Missouri on Saturday, and according to the AP trend, letting a team get within 40 points of them will mean sure death when the rankings come out.

Finally, I'd like to congratulate the Massachusetts women's cross country team one more time on winning their third Atlantic 10 championship in a row two weeks back. Oh, and to all you folks out there who think cross country is a minor sport: You try running five kilometers in significantly less than 20 minutes. If it was an easy task, we'd all be doing it. Thank you.

■ Thompson

the Minutewomen's senior goalkeeper and tri–captain, is the reliability Thompson not only brings to the team, but to their co–responsibilities as the last line of defense.

"She's a mainstay player, and without her, we couldn't tie the connection between the defense and the midfield together," Dion said. "Last year, she became more vocal, and her role became more and more important. Honestly, I don't know what I would do without her.

"I didn't realize how much I would miss her until I played summer ball this year. It seems that she is not that important to the minds of most people, but not in my mind."

A down and up season

During a tumultuous season that has thrown everything but the kitchen sink at the Minutewomen, Thompson has been the consistent component in the UMass lineup. Due to the insinuous influence of injuries, players like senior Erica Iverson and junior Sophie Lecot have flipped–flopped and flew to varying spots around the pitch — almost more than John Belushi's stage antics during his Blues Brothers days.

Through all of this, Rudy has had Thompson to rely on, and she has started in her sweeper position in every game this season, and in 40 out of 41 matches in the previous two seasons. So, like the sun rising in the east; like Larry Bird hitting a game–winning shot; and, like death and taxes, Thompson has been the rock of the Minutewoman defense.

"We've played and survived without players like Robin Smith and Erica Iverson, but the one person we could not do without is Amanda," Rudy said. "She has tremendous courage, and she has fought off a hellacious back this season. She's in a can't–make–mistakes position on the field, and she knows that.

"She is just a big, big–time player for us."

The dedication Thompson has put into the UMass program the past three years is partly due to her strong competitive streak, but it is also due to the fact that she has the pride of the uniform. In this down and up season, Thompson has had to deal with more than a lack of recognition, but the lack of recognition from the underclassmen concerning the tradition of this storied program.

In the end, it is all about doing the UMass uniform justice, whether Thompson is recognized or not. After two tough losses to Georgia and Clemson two weeks back, the intense emotion she puts into the game shined through for all to see — and will again be seen this weekend against Harvard.

"This season, we had to totally reintroduce what our team stood for, but I think the newcomers have fit in pretty well," Thompson said. "It's difficult to come right into a new situation and mold as a team, but the thing is that we are UMass. You have to play for your school, and play to win.

"I was in tears after the Georgia and Clemson games because I couldn't remember the last time we lost two games in one weekend. It's all about losing, and the newcomers don't know what it means to go to the NCAAs, and then all your work ends in a second. We are UMass, and you have to keep remembering that, and keep going and winning."

■ field hockey

Atlantic 10, and UMass has played the Nittany Lions as recently as last year (the game was a UMass 4–3 overtime win at Connecticut).

The series between the teams, which dates back to 1979, stands 5–3 in UMass' favor.

The Nittany Lions have fared well with a tough schedule this year. They played North Carolina to overtime before falling, 6–5. They picked up a 2–1 win over James Madison and a 4–3 victory against UConn.

Penn State played in two tilts against Atlantic 10 opponents, West Chester and Temple. UMass' tournament opponent won both, 5–1 and 2–0, respectively.

The tournament's top four seeds, which will all host this weekend's action, all receive first round byes. No 1 seed North Carolina, the two–time defending national champ, will meet the winner of Saturday's UConn–James Madison match–up. Both the Huskies and Dukes received at–large bids after falling in their respective conference tournaments.

Second–seeded Old Dominion, the Colonial conference champ, will face off against either America East winner Northeastern or Ball State. The Cardinals, the Mid–America titlest, advanced to the NCAAs after a play–in win over Holy Cross, the Patriot League champion.

No. 4 seed Maryland, the third of three Atlantic Coast Conference teams which received at–large bids (The ACC does not have enough schools which play field hockey, therefore the conference does not have an automatic bid.), will play the winner of Saturday's Princeton–Boston College game. The Tigers won the Ivy, while BC wrapped up the Big East automatic berth.

■ hoops

Chris Burgess are four of last year's top preps, but their playing time could be limited because the Blue Devils also have a number of talented athletes remaining.

Steve Wojciechowski, Trajan Langdon and Roshown MacLeod are likely to start for the Devils, and Coach K has practically an entire second team he could go to if the situation dictates.

It goes without saying that Duke's instrastate rival, North Carolina, consistently turns out talent that helps the Atlantic Coast Conference maintain its rank as college hoop's premiere league. This year is no different.

The look to the Tar Heels' coaching staff will be very different, however, with the dean of the game — Dean Smith — gone from the sky blue bench. Smith's longtime assistant, Bill Guthridge, takes over and Smith's presence and influence will undoubtedly still be felt.

Carolina has their go–to guy back in Antawn Jamison, and with good reason. Jamison can make things happen in the paint, but he lacks an outside game. It is not necessary for him to be on the perimeter, but strength away from the basket will help his pro chances. Still, he nearly averaged a double–double last season. Believe this, Jamison will be gone after this year.

As always, Kentucky will have at least a share of control in the Southeastern Conference. New coach Tubby Smith has big shoes to fill now that Rick Pitino has opted for Celtic green over Kentucky bluegrass.

Scott Padgett and Jamaal Magloire lead the charge for the Wildcats, who have lost five first–round draft choices in the last two years.

The challenge for SEC supremacy should come from South Carolina, whose three–guard line–up propelled the Gamecocks to stardom last year. But the other USC bottomed out with a first–round loss to Coppin State in the NCAA tournament.

In order for the Gamecocks to advance this year, backcourt mates B.J. McKie and Melvin Watson will need to return to the form that bolstered them last year.

And of course, what preseason column would be complete without attempting a preseason All–America list. Here goes:

Point guard — Bibby The kid has talent, and although he has some tough competition in the form of Wojciechowski and little known Earl Boykins of Eastern Michigan, he possesses the all–around game that will earn him All–America accolades.

Shooting guard — Chad Austin shot 38.7 percent from 3– point range and averaged 17 points per game. He plays for Purdue, which is why many don't even know who he is. Pure shooter, straight butter.

Small forward — Clemson's Greg Buckner is a true small forward at 6–foot–4, and he is the heart and soul of that Tiger team. His contribution cannot be measured in mere numbers, but what he does that can be quantified puts him among the small forward elite.

Power forward — This one is tough. Both Kansas' Raef LaFrentz and Jamison have the necessary skills, but LaFrentz has a better all–around game. If Jamison finds a jump shot, he's got as good a chance as anyone at Player of the Year, but right now, LaFrentz is the man.

Center — The essence of an All–America team is to have the nation's best player at each position. That means there shouldn't be an All–America team with five forwards, even if some are short and some are tall. Therefore, Baylor's Brian Skinner gets the nod at center. Watch for him, you'll miss him otherwise and you'll regret it.

Horoscopes

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — Travel is in the picture today, and you'll want to be sure you're getting the best bargain you can. Time is of the essence right now.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — There is no real reason to spend money on luxury today when there are so many practical things you can concentrate on at this time.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You must watch for any negative emotion that may stand between you and harmony at this time. Beware of jealousy in particular!

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — You can achieve something that attracts a great deal of attention — or, if you play your cards right, you can be completely overlooked.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — You are going to want to be out of the spotlight as often as possible today. The things you have to do you'll want to do in private.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — It is important that you let someone follow his or her instincts when tending to duties you have assigned to them today. Be flexible, not rigid.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — Take care you don't come across as too arrogant or aggressive today. You never know when someone will be in a position to judge you.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — You will receive some news today which can prove good or bad, depending on how you adjust your modus operandi after you hear it.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — Though you may be afraid of being found out today, there is no reason to think that any revelation can threaten to hurt you.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You are going to want to be there for a friend or family member who needs assistance today. You have been promising support; now you can give it.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — What seems positive may prove to be quite negative when all is said and done — and vice versa. Opposites are prominent all day long.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — The meaning of an important message may vary slightly, depending upon who is interpreting it. Trust your instincts when disagreement arises.

Thompson is the center of the UM defense

Junior sweeper recognized by team, but not the A-10

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

If your judgment on the worth and impact of Amanda Thompson was solely based on All–Tournament, All–Conference, All–Region and All–American selections, you would not know she even existed.

Truthfully— for the most part, that is.

If you just used those criteria to judge what she brings to the No. 20 Massachusetts women's soccer team, the fact folder on the junior defender would have moths flying out of it. If you asked one of those so–called experts about Thompson, the scene would turn into something like a spaghetti western: a ghost town, with some unseen cowpoke whistling in the background, while tumbleweeds fly through the windy, desolate scene.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS
Amanda Thompson

Well, as we all know, experts can be wrong — for the most part, that is. But, in this case, they are very wrong.

In her three years in the Pioneer Valley, the sweeper has quietly established a solid defensive reputation, and is popularly considered the rock of a historically strong UMass defense, and with all of the praise and the hoopla of the establishment and media put to the side.

As the selections for the All–Conference team were numbly announced at the Atlantic 10 banquet last Thursday night in Cincinnati, Thompson's name was not heard. Going into this Sunday's first–round NCAA match against Harvard, a second–team selection in her freshman year has been the only plaudit on the defender's shelf at UMass.

In an affirmation sense, that bothers her.

"Actually it did bother me, and I was real upset after last weekend, because I set high goals for myself," Thompson said. "I kind of lost some confidence. But I talked to coach, and he told me the team does think that I'm a big benefactor in our success.

Unless you're Sara Whalen [from UConn], and are a real flashy player, sweepers are pretty much the unsung heroines.

"I am a stay–at–home defender, and I like to organize, so I would rather be noticeable with that. The recognition I get from the team does mean a lot to me, but every once in a while I wish I could be recognized outside of that."

The line of people to give Thompson the recognition she deserves starts with coach Jim Rudy himself. He agrees that the true defender is not recognized more than the flashy defender, but what he wants out of his junior defender is solidity— which mirrors his opinions on her as a player.

"The first thing about defenders is that the visual attackers will be the first to be recognized," Rudy said. "On this year's All–Conference team, where were the defensive specialists? A lot of coaches don't nominate those kind of players because of a lack of stats, but I nominated her.

"I'll put her on my All–American ballot. Her worth is not lost on me, but quality, efficient play is lost in those kind of choices."

Now you see her, now you don't

Recognizability is not the key to the defensive game; which, in a nutshell is Thompson's game.

For one thing, a defender's job is to defend.

Simple enough — easy like a Sunday morning, so to say.

Yet, in some cases, a defender does more than defend. In recent UMass memory, current players like Erica Iverson and past ones like Erin Lynch could do a little bit of everything — and, with a passion. From the backline to midfield to the final third, those kind of defenders found opportunities to contribute to every part of the game.

However, the reason why those kind of defenders are able to do a little bit of everything is because one defender can do the most important part of defending — defend, and with a passion. If that explanation confuses you, then look up the word "defender" in the Minutewoman dictionary, and you will find Thompson's face right next to it.

Her stay–at–home style is what UMass relies upon, and the sacrifice of the spotlight has given her teammates the chance to shine.

"Coming in as a freshman, Erica was real excited because it meant that she could move into a more forward position," Thompson said. "My position definitely helps them get forward, because they know that I'll be back there. Tactical decisions come into factor, and because of injuries the coach has had to move people around, but me and Danielle [Dion] joke around that the coach can't take away her sweeper.

"Everybody is accustomed to me being in the center, and it's alright with me."

What is more than alright to Dion,

AFC teams prepare for playoff push

Since it seems like the NFL column starts off every week with the Patriots, I've decided to end that trend.

Instead, let's talk about the Jets.

Last year Jets was an acronym for "just end the season," but now it stands for a team that is tied for first place in the AFC East. in reality, the only reason why they're tied for first is because they have a cupcake schedule and yes... the coaching of Bill Parcells.

They may have gotten screwed over on Sunday, thanks to the great officiating of the crew who ruled that Glenn Foley's pass to Wayne Chrebet on a key fourth down was incomplete, but hey, there's your payback for

on
The NFL

Drew Bledsoe's "incomplete" pass to Shawn Jefferson a few weeks ago.

And as for those terrific calls— I have two words for you: instant replay. Bring it back, but just put a damn time limit on it.

Anyway, Seattle is doing its best to make the playoffs for the first time in almost a decade. Warren Moon lit up the porous San Diego secondary on Sunday to improve the Seahawks to 6–4. Seattle does have the luxury of playing four of its final six games against teams with less than .500 records, but their games against Kansas City on Nov. 23 and San Francisco in the season finale on Dec. 21 will test the true mettle of this team.

Arrested Development once sang a song about Tennessee. Well guess what? The Oilers are also threatening to make a playoff run as well, but face a little tougher road. It's all up to Steve McNair and Eddie George. I hope that the Oilers make it (and hopefully they won't blow a 35–3 lead this time), but we'll just have to wait and see.

I guess that I've put the Patriots off long enough. They annihilated Buffalo by putting on their best all–around display of the season. But don't start thinking Super Bowl just yet. The real test comes on Sunday when they will travel to the Big Sombrero to face the Yucs.

The winner of this game should catapault into the playoff hunt, while the loser may find themselves hitting a brick wall. Both teams have tough schedules the rest of the way, and a win on Sunday would be a nice momentum booster for the final five weeks.

The Broncos pummeled Carolina on Sunday, showing the nation once again that they are the team to beat.

A battle amongst the Masses; comparing Amherst and Lowell

Tomorrow night, the Alumni Cup, annually awarded to the winner of the annual UMass/UMass Lowell hockey season series, will be up for grabs beneath the big green roof at Mullins.

The River Hawks took the first of this year's three meetings, 6–4, last month and can skate away with the Cup for the first time ever with a win. This worries me because I know that this branch of the state university system is the superior one, and to prove it I've broken things down scientifically on a category–by–category basis.

UPC Mascots: UMass changed from Redmen to Minutemen in 1973 (trend–setting long before it was popular), adopting a symbol that represents both the Commonwealth and the brave colonists of the 1770s. self–trained militia who resisted an oppressive English government to fight for their liberty. UMass Lowell changed to a fictional bird from Chiefs just a few years ago, partly to sell more merchandise.

Leigh Torbin

Advantage: Amherst

Literature: Amherst offers Emily Dickinson, Lowell gave the world Jack Kerouac, I've never been big on poetry, yet I feel I can relate more to Kerouac's beatnik Bible, having spent good chunks of time myself On the Road. Advantage: Lowell

Location: Lowell is 30 minutes from the greatest college town in America. Amherst is 30 minutes from either Springfield, Hatfield, Westfield, Deerfield and even Chesterfield. Add 'em all up and, compared to Beantown, you've got about as much excitement as BU's Nickerson Field these days.

Advantage: Lowell

Civic Reputation: Amherst is known for academia, Lowell is known for decrepit 175 year old factories and mills.

Advantage: Amherst

Native Musicians: UMass gave us the Pixies, one of the original creators of American punk and a band that actually wrote a song called "UMass." I can't think of anyone from Lowell that's played an arena larger than their own garage, and in an up–to–the–second poll everyone else currently in the Collegian newsroom is completely stumped too. Advantage: Amherst

NHL Alums: Lowell has a pair of alums in the NHL, Craig MacTavish and Calgary goaltender Dwayne Roloson. UMass has none yet.

Advantage: Lowell

Music Festivals: Here we used to have something called a Spring Concert where bands you'd actually heard of (Phish, Beastie Boys, Fishbone, Blues Traveler et. al.) played for free. Lowell, meanwhile, unlocks its doors for a pretty fair city–wide Folk Music Festival every summer. Returning to the great arbiters of music, Bob and Mindy Torbin seldom miss the Lowell Folk Music Festival, but skipped last year's big pond–side Redman gig.

Advantage: Lowell

Variety of courses: Flipping through the pre–reg guide, you can sign up for Existential Philosophy in your choice of English, French, German or Spanish, Readings in Italian Facism, the ComLit Department's Decadence class (I hear they teach from the Motley Crüe hits album Decade of Decadence), or the Sociology course Sexuality, Gender and the Law. I've never seen a Lowell course guide, but somehow I doubt they offer these courses.

Advantage: Amherst

Diversity: UMass Lowell is a commuter school of 6,000 fairly homogenous suburban Bostonians, Amherst has people from everywhere; beachy California girls, numerous foreign exchange students

Field Hockey preps for NCAA tourney

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

For capturing the Atlantic 10 tournament title, the Massachusetts field hockey team was rewarded with an automatic berth in the NCAA tournament.

Yesterday, the Minutewomen learned their tourney fate. Saturday, UMass will play Big 10 tournament champion Penn State at Virginia. The Cavaliers (18–2) received the No. 3 seed and a first–round bye. They will play the Penn State–UMass winner on Sunday.

The Nittany Lions (17–5) tied for the regular season conference crown with Michigan, and the two teams met for the league's tourney title. Penn State claimed the 2–1 victory to secure an automatic berth into the national tournament.

UMass finished the regular season runner–up to West Chester. The Minutewomen earned the conference's automatic berth with a 3–1 A–10 tourney championship win over the Golden Rams.

Penn State is a relatively familiar opponent for the Minutewomen. The school was formerly a member of the

Donaghue reigns as A–10 champ

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

When the Massachusetts women's cross country team travels to Franklin Park in Boston for the NCAA District 1 qualifying meet this Saturday, senior Rebecca Donaghue will be one of the Minutewomen's best chances for advancement.

Two Saturdays ago, the two–time defending Atlantic–10 champion UMass runners probably appeared strange to their opposition. A few eyebrows were probably cocked in the direction of the team just prior to the soggy 1997 conference championship.

"Right before A–10s, somebody put the tape, 'Come On Eileen' into the van," explained senior Christy Martin. "We all started dancing in the rain, just before we ran our asses off."

While the competition was tightening up in the cold, wet weather— mentally and physically— the Minutewomen were light–heartedly dancing to the beat of a different drummer. Right in the middle of it all was Rebecca Donaghue, the reigning conference championship victor.

"We had this '80s party," said Donaghue. "I had this tape with 'Come On Eileen' by Dexy's Midnight Runners and everybody loved it. We played it right before the race."

One might think a competitor like Donaghue would have been getting psyched up for the race in the traditional sense... standing alone, breathing slowly and doing some light stretches— like are usually seen on advertisements for Nike. One might have expected the school record–holder in the indoor 1600m and the outdoor 1500m to be soberingly serious, like a monk in painful self–evaluation as the race grew closer. What the average fan doesn't know, though, is that the senior had as much of a reason as any to lead the team in pre–race jubilation. Before the season began, it wasn't clear if she'd be able to ably compete at all, much less take part in the conference championship.

She had recently suffered from a bad case of bursitis in her heel.

"I wore these shoes that were way too small," said Donaghue. "One day they rubbed my heel and then we did this really hard workout. Then I couldn't walk. I tried to run through it, but eventually I had to stop running.

"I had it all summer long and it forced me to stop doing track at the end of the year. It hurt me because I loved track. I saw a physical trainer and I couldn't wear shoes— only sandals. I had to water–run in pools and ponds."

Banished from land training, Donaghue continued her summer workouts by running in deep water to avoid stress on her heel. This training was tiresome and unfulfilling at times, but the senior co–captain pressed on. Slowly and tediously, she worked her way back on land.

"In August, I would go to a track and run around twice," said Donaghue. "I'd walk a little and see if I could do it again."

However, the 800 meters that constitute two trips around a regulation track were nothing compared to the five kilometers that

Duke returns; UNC, Kentucky looking good

The preseason rankings are out. The favorites have been picked. The first games are in the books. Ladies and gentlemen, the 1997–98 college basketball season has begun.

There are officially only 138 days until a new king is crowned in the world of college hoop.

Or will there be a new king? Arizona, last year's champion, returns everyone from their banner campaign. Not only does Lute Olsen have one of the nation's premier point guards in Mike Bibby, but he also has a strong supporting cast — led by senior Miles Simon — and a wealth of post– season experience.

This was supposed to be the year for the Wildcats. But, they surprised everybody by maturing at a rapid rate and at the expense of favored Kansas and North Carolina. An impressive feat anyway, but more so considering Arizona compiled a .500 record in its last eight Pac–10 games.

Only nine teams have won back–to–back NCAA titles, and It will take more consistency than the Wildcats displayed last year in order for them to become the 10th.

The last team to achieve the back–to–back feat will likely challenge Arizona for court supremacy. The Duke Blue Devils not only have a strong returning group, coach Mike Krzyzewski has also brought in what is widely considered the best recruiting class in the country. Elton Brand, Shane Battier, William Avery and

China may release political prisoners

BEIJING (AP) — China may free one or more prominent dissidents in the next few weeks as a gesture of good will toward America, the U.S. ambassador said yesterday.

Ambassador James Sasser said he was disappointed China did not release anyone during President Jiang Zemin's visit to the United States, which ended Nov. 3. Jiang has so far withstood U.S. pressure to release political prisoners.

"But time has not run out on that, and there's still, I think, hope that in the next few weeks a prominent dissident or dissidents will be released," Sasser told reporters.

Sasser did not say who he hoped would be freed or mention any specific indications from Chinese officials that they were planning to release political prisoners soon.

China has sometimes freed dissidents on medical parole. The families of two of the most prominent imprisoned democracy campaigners, Wei Jingsheng and Wang Dan, say both prisoners are suffering from serious ailments, which may make them eligible for release.

Strawberry company president pleads guilty

SAN DIEGO (AP) — The former president of a company that supplied Mexican strawberries that made more than 200 Michigan schoolchildren ill with hepatitis pleaded guilty yesterday to lying and other counts.

Frederick L. Williamson pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court to conspiracy, making false statements and making a false claim. He could be sentenced to up to five years in prison and fined $250,000 for each of the three counts.

Williamson also pleaded guilty on behalf of Andrew & Williamson Sales Co. of San Diego, which could be fined up to $500,000 per count.

Andrew & Williamson Sales Co. and its former president were indicted by a federal grand jury for allegedly lying about the source of its fruit.

Sentencing was scheduled for Feb. 2. Williamson, who remains an officer in the company, remained free in the meantime.

Under a settlement agreement the company agreed to pay $1.3 million in civil damages plus a $200,000 criminal fine over the next five years. The company also will have to pay an undetermined sum to states for cleanup, damages and the cost of destroying berries. Remaining counts in the indictment will be dropped. Williamson's son, Fred Jr., who is also an officer in the company, said the government's charges stemmed from "a single transaction in a minor and now–discontinued segment of our business. It is and was an anomaly that will not be repeated." In March, more than 260 children and teachers developed hepatitis A after eating frozen strawberries in the Michigan school lunch program.

MassPIRG's hunger awareness week to benefit local shelters

By Julie Siegal
Collegian Staff

Sleeping outside in the cold autumn weather, skipping meals and donating canned goods to local homeless shelters are some of the events University of Massachusetts students can take part in during Hunger and Homelessness week.

The seven–day event, which runs from Nov. 16–22, is sponsored by the University's chapter of the Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group (MassPIRG).

The annual event is a national campaign founded by PIRG, which focuses its energy solely on the issue of hunger and homelessness.

MassPIRG's main goal is to raise awareness on campus, said Allison Roberts, MassPIRG campus organizer. Last year the group raised $3,000 in donations through campus–wide events.

MassPIRG urges students to donate their time, if only for one event out of the week.

"Students don't realize how important their part is in the campus community," Roberts said.

It's also a great way for student organizations to fulfill their community service obligation, she said.

This year, Hunger and Homelessness week will kick off at 5 p.m. on Sunday, Nov. 16 at the Campus Center, room 917. A photo exhibit will display black and white pictures of area soup shelters.

Hunger and Homelessness continues on Monday, Nov. 17, with a service day at Amherst Survival Center on Sat., Nov. 22.

A Fast for Hunger will take place on Tues., Nov. 18 on campus for people who wish to participate. The fasters will wear a colored ribbon to signify fasting and donate the money they normally spend on lunch and dinner to MassPIRG.

The money collected from the fast will be distributed to survival centers and various organizations in the community, according to Roberts.

Students will collect spare change for the Quarter Drive for Hunger from 12–7 p.m. on Wed. Nov. 19. Last year's event raised $1,000 alone, Roberts said.

On Thursday, Nov. 20, volunteers will get the opportunity to leave the comfort of their dorm rooms, apartments or houses and take part in the All–American Sleep–Out at the campus pond from 5 p.m. to 9 a.m. on Friday.

A speaker will lecture on the issue of being homeless and participants will collect pledges for every hour they spend sleeping outdoors. The money collected will go to local homeless shelters.

The sleep–out is a great way for students to see the other side of society, Roberts said.

"People don't normally see other people sleeping in boxes in menial conditions," she said. "Especially not in the chilly weather."

If students can't do any of the events, MassPIRG members urge people to donate canned goods, which will be picked up on Fri., Nov. 21 by the "Hunger Bus," which collects food from all of MassPIRG's 27 campus chapters.

"We're (UMass) probably at the end of the route," Roberts said. "So, when the bus arrives it'll already be

U.N. withdraws arms inspectors

By Robert Reid
Associated Press

UNITED NATIONS — Refusing to let Iraq dictate who can inspect its weapons, the United Nations decided yesterday to withdraw all arms inspectors from Iraq after Saddam Hussein ordered Americans on the U.N. team out immediately.

The decision to only leave a skeletal crew in Baghdad came after Iraq would not even let the six American inspectors stay until today and fly out.

Instead, the Americans, plus an unspecified number of other team members, left Baghdad about 11 p.m. for a grueling drive through the desert to the Jordanian border. It was expected to take at least 10 hours to reach Amman, the Jordanian capital.

About 70 other weapons monitors planned to leave today. U.S. Ambassador Bill Richardson declared that Iraq was in "open defiance" of the United Nations. "I think there are going to be some serious consequences," he said, without elaborating. The U.N. Security Council met yesterday afternoon to discuss its next moves in the escalating crisis. Earlier, Iraq's deputy prime minister, Tariq Aziz, hinted Baghdad might shut down what remains of the U.N. monitoring operation if the non–Americans were withdrawn.

The inspectors were charged with making sure Iraq eliminates its long range missiles and other weapons of

Palestine to declare statehood in '99

By Ibrahim Barzak
Associated Press

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip — The Palestinians will declare statehood in 1999 at the end of their five–year interim period of autonomy regardless of whether Israel agrees, Yasser Arafat said yesterday.

Arafat's remarks angered the Israelis who say a unilateral declaration of independence would violate understandings that neither side will do anything to prejudice the outcome of talks on a permanent peace agreement.

In such an accord, to be reached by May 1999, Israel and the Palestinians must agree on the nature of the emerging Palestinian entity, and it is widely believed it will include provisions for Palestinian statehood in parts of the West Bank and Gaza Strip. The five–year autonomy period began in May 1994 with the start of limited Palestinian self–rule in the West Bank and Gaza. Talks on a permanent peace agreement have not yet begun because Israel and the Palestinians are still arguing over implementation of parts of the interim agreement.

For example, Israel has yet to start pulling back troops in the West Bank in three stages, as promised earlier this year. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has said he would not hand over any land until Arafat has made a bigger effort to rein in Islamic militants responsible for more than a dozen suicide bombings in Israel since 1994.

Arafat said Thursday he would bring his people statehood as promised, regardless of the state of the negotiations.

"I want to tell them that we will be able to implement what we promised our people," Arafat told reporters after a meeting with the Canadian foreign minister, Lloyd Axworthy.

"The interim agreement is five years. Three years of it has passed, and we are waiting for the next two years to declare [statehood]," Arafat said in his halting English. "At the end of the five years, our target will be to establish our independent state."

U.N. releases Congo report

By Philip Waller
Associated Press

GENEVA — A "climate of terror" prevails throughout Congo under President Laurent Kabila's rule, according to a U.N. human rights report released yesterday.

"The regime has eliminated the civil rights to life, liberty and physical integrity," the report said.

But the report does credit Kabila's government with ending looting, otherwise reducing crime and making cities safer since his rebel forces took over the country, formerly known as Zaire, and ousted dictator Mobutu Sese Seko in May.

In Congo's capital, Kinshasa, Celestin Lwangi, Congo's justice minister, called the report "a little flimsy" and lambasted its author, U.N. special investigator Roberto Garreton.

Garreton said he based his 50–page report on information from U.N. officials, humanitarian organizations and other sources. His conclusions echoed those in a report by the Lutheran Church, he said.

The report delivered Tuesday to the U.N. General Assembly, says "a climate of terror" prevails throughout the Congo. It blames the atmosphere on the virtually unopposed victory by Kabila's forces, the settling of old scores and the alleged atrocities committed by Kabila's forces during their 8–month campaign to topple Mobutu.

There had been a "budding transition to democracy" during the last years of Mobutu's 32–year regime, Garreton said. But the record of the first few months of Kabila's rule "seems less than satisfactory."

In May, Kabila announced a timetable for elections in 1999, but Nutrition center proposed

By Tomar Carroll
Collegian Staff

If the dream of faculty in the nutrition and exercise science departments is realized, athletes and coaches from across the country will be coming to the University of Massachusetts for nutritional counseling.

Stella Volpe and Robin Levine of the nutrition department, in conjunction with Priscilla Clarkson of the exercise science department, have proposed the creation of a Center for Nutrition in Sport and Human Performance at UMass.

The Center would link the departments of nutrition and exercise science and the division of athletics to study nutrition and athletic performance, with a goal of providing nutritional counseling for optimum performance in sports to athletes and coaches at UMass and across the country, as well as to recreational athletes interested in improving their performance in physical activity.

Levine said the Center, which would be the first of its type in the country, would be a resources for athletes and coaches at UMass and in the larger community.

"We will be a source of accurate information for the community, which doesn't always have access to credible sources," Levine said. "We will bring them accurate nutritional information."

Through a combination of research, education and outreach, Volpe said, the Center would serve UMass, the Pioneer Valley, and the Commonwealth.

Faculty and students in the nutrition and exercise science departments would collaborate with UMass varsity athletes in researching the effects of nutrition on their performance.

"UMass athletes will have more of an opportunity to be involved in research on performance that can help give them information to enhance their own performance," Levine said.

Faculty in the Center would develop new elective courses, such as Levine's course on Eating Disorders, in athletic performance and sports nutrition.

The Center would also develop educational materials, such as the sport nutrition newsletter recently put out by Volpe and Levine, for UMass and the community, and present and conduct workshops for athletes, coaches and nutritionists.

In addition, the Center would provide a centralized number and location for people to receive individual counseling.

"This will make us more user–friendly," Levine said. "We are trying to take resources that exist and combine them In one place for a more synergistic power."

Eventually, Volpe said, the Center's outreach activities would extend across the country.

Director of Food Services Richard Rossi dead at 59

NORTHAMPTON — Richard N. Rossi, 59, of 31 Dana St., died due to cardiac arrest last Friday at Cooley Dickinson Hospital. He was the director of Food Service at the University of Massachusetts.

Rossi graduated from the Stockbridge School of Agriculture at UMass. A native of Northampton, Rossi attended local schools. Besides serving as director of food service at UMass, he was also a food consultant to the New York Giants.

He leaves his wife, Sandra (Carlson) Rossi; his mother, Agnes (Gazzillo) Rossi; two sons, Todd N. and Tyler F., both of Northampton; a daughter, Samantha Rossi Kosakowski of North Andover; two brothers, Anthony of Belchertown and Donald J. of Northampton; two sisters, Rosemary A. Gorman of Northampton and Marcia N. Shumway of Williamsburg.

There will be a memorial service Tuesday morning at the Edwards church with a private burial in Spring Grove Cemetery in Florence. There are no calling hours. Memorial contributions may be made to the Richard N. Rossi Memorial Scholarship Fund in the Hotel, Restaurant and Travel Administration Program at UMass in care of Auxiliary Service Office, Worcester Dining Commons, Amherst, 01003.

Awards

A $1.4 million grant from the National Science Foundation (NSF) has been awarded to George Avrunin, professor of mathematics and statistics at UMass.

The NSF grant, which was awarded for research on the effective linking of computer systems, will fund a four-year project Avrunin is working on in conjunction with UMass computer science professors Lori Clarke and Leon Osterweil.

The group's research could eventually be used in the development of computer systems used in areas such as air traffic control, airline reservation systems, and the monitoring of hospital stations.

Julius G. Fabos, professor of landscape architecture and regional planning at UMass, is the 1997 recipient of the prestigious American Society of Landscape Architects (ASLA) Medal, the highest award of ASLA.

The ASLA Medal is awarded to individuals who have made extraordinary contributions to the profession of landscape architecture and whose work has had a unique impact on the profession through landscape architectural design, planning, writing, or public service, on a scale to impact public welfare and life nationally or internationally.

Fabos is a pioneer in the field of landscape planning, having established Metrolitan Landscape Planning (METLAND) interdisciplinary research group during the early 1970s. METLAND was one of the earliest groups to advance the use of the geographic information system (GIS).

Also, Fabos is a well-known authority on greenway planning, which is the protection and management of the fragile landscapes along rivers, streams and coasts, and linking parks and open spaces with those areas in the creation of greenway networks.

Nicholas Dines and Mark Lindhult, professors of landscape architecture and landscape design, also received merit awards for communication from ALSA.

Profs. publish

UMass English professor and writer-in-residence Jay Neugeboren has published a collection of 15 short stories titled, Don't Worry About the Kids (University of Massachusetts Press).

The collection is the second of his career and includes many prize-winning works that have appeared in magazines such as The Atlantic Monthly, Gentleman's Quarterly, and The Gettysburg Review.

statehood

In an interview with the Israeli daily Yediot Ahronot published yesterday, Arafat said: "We will declare the establishment of a state whether Netanyahu wants us to or not... even if part of the state remains under occupation and contains settlements." Netanyahu's senior aide, David Barillan, said a unilateral declaration of statehood would violate earlier agreements "because it prejudices negotiations on the final status."

Netanyahu has staunchly opposed Palestinian statehood, saying he would only approve Palestinian autonomy in parts of the West Bank and Gaza Strip, with Israel remaining in charge of foreign affairs and external security.

In London yesterday, Netanyahu told British members of Parliament that he believed a final peace settlement was "within reach" if the Palestinians accepted that they could not have full attributes of statehood.

"Do we agree, for example, that the Palestinians will build a large army that could import weapons, missiles and so on that could be placed on the hills above Israel? The answer is no. Do we agree that this Palestinian entity could make military pacts with Saddam Hussein? ...The answer is no," he said.

Arafat told Yediot he preferred to win statehood as a result of negotiations, but that he might have no choice to make a unilateral declaration because of the deadlock in the talks.

In remarks to reporters, Arafat accused Netanyahu of dragging his feet in the negotiations. "The Israeli government is trying to waste time," Arafat said yesterday.

Bar-Illan blamed the Palestinians for the deadlock, saying they had failed to live up to their commitment to fight terrorism. Both Arafat and Netanyahu are to meet later this week with Secretary of State Madeleine Albright.

preparations still have not been started, Garreton said.

Kabila's governing alliance is the only authorized party in Congo and is dominated by ethnic Tutsis and former exiles who lived abroad during Mobutu's rule, the report says.

Kabila now has "absolute control" over the country, the report concludes.

Garreton, originally appointed by the 53-nation U.N. Human Rights Commission in 1994 to investigate conditions in Congo, angered government supporters with a report in the spring that said he had found strong evidence of mass graves in territory controlled by Kabila's forces where refugee camps also were located.

The government's ire toward Garreton hasn't faded. "I don't see how he, a Chilean, has a valid opinion," Lwangi, the justice minister, said of Garreton's report.

The Kabila government has said repeatedly it would allow a U.N. commission to investigate allegations that Kabila's forces had killed Rwandan Hutu refugees, but permission has always been withdrawn.

Garreton was appointed by the United Nations to lead the investigation, but after the Kabila government accused him of bias, he was replaced in August by Atsu Koffi-Amega of Togo.

The 23-member U.N. investigating team has been stymied since by the government in its attempt to search for evidence of mass graves.

mass destruction, as the Security Council ordered it to at the end of the 1991 Gulf War. The council will not lift trade sanctions against Iraq — imposed after Iraq's 1990 invasion of Kuwait — until those terms are met. Iraq implemented the expulsion order one day after the council voted unanimously to condemn Iraq for its Oct. 29 decision to kick out the American inspectors.

It also stopped a travel ban on Iraqis who interfere with the inspections but avoided any explicit threat of military force. Iraq had put off implementing its expulsion order until the council finished its debate.

Richard Butler, the head of the U.N. team admitted Thursday that pulling all inspectors out would severely hamper the U.N.'s ability to ensure that Iraq is not building weapons of mass destruction. But Butler, an Australian, said the United Nations could not tolerate "this illegal separation of nationalities."

"Therefore, I will withdraw all [inspection] staff tomorrow and leave a skeleton staff at the Baghdad center to sustain our facility pending resolution of the present crisis," Butler said. Butler said he hoped the departing team members could return when "the conditions are acceptable."

He added that U.S.-manned U-2 spy planes would continue to fly over Iraq despite Baghdad's threats to shoot them down.

In Paris, the French Foreign Ministry condemned the expulsion. France is among the Western powers most sympathetic to Iraq. "The execution of its Oct. 29 decision is unacceptable," the ministry statement said. It regretted that Iraq has failed to "show its will to cooperate fully with the special commission, which remains the only way for Iraq to succeed in having the embargo removed."

For the last 11 days, Butler has insisted on sending along Americans on U.N. inspections, and each time the Iraqis have barred the U.S. inspectors from entering suspected weapons sites. Last week, Butler accused Iraq of taking advantage of the suspension of inspections to move sensitive equipment and tamper with cameras that monitor weapons sites around the clock.

Iraq claims Americans dominate and manipulate the U.N. Special Commission, which conducts the inspections, to keep the sanctions in place.

After more than six years of inspections, Butler's team says Iraq is still trying to conceal information on its weapons programs.

Earlier yesterday, Aziz said again that Iraq was willing to cooperate with the U.N. weapons inspectors — except for the Americans. Aziz, who arrived here Monday for the council debate, said Iraq "is ready to continue its cooperation with" the non-American inspectors and allow them to perform their duties "fully."

Aziz said, however, if Butler decided to remove the entire team, "he will bear the responsibility for his decision."

Later that night, a Hunger Music Jam will be held at Pearl Street Night Club in Northampton. The event will be open to people of all ages, and will include MassPIRG members from all over Massachusetts.

The conclusion of Hunger and Homelessness Week will begin at 5 p.m. on Mon., Nov. 17, when students can buy $2-3 tickets for the most popular event, according to Roberts, the Oxfam dinner, which will be held in the Campus Center auditorium.

The room will be divided into first, second and third- world countries, with students eating food from the world country to which they are assigned.

Hunger and Homelessness Week is a great opportunity for students to give a part of themselves to people who need the help, said Veronica MacDonald, MassPIRG member and junior psychology and anthropology major.

"It'll do a world of good," MacDonald said. "These things just can't backfire."

MacDonald is pleased with last year's results and envisions this year to be bigger and better.

"We pretty much reached our goals [last year]," she said. "We have so many volunteers [this year], I think it'll be better. I'm optimistic."

MassPIRG will advertise for Hunger and Homelessness in upcoming weeks and will set up information tables in the Campus Center for students who wish to sign up and get more information on the week's events.

New AIDS drug not very effective

By Paul Recer
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A drug "cocktail" that revolutionized the treatment of AIDS is unable to wipe out reservoirs of virus hiding in certain blood cells, researchers find in a discovery that dims hopes for a cure.

The finding means that patients may have to take the AIDS drugs for the rest of their lives — while hoping for new types of treatment to stamp out the final traces of infection by the virus that causes the disease.

Three separate teams of scientists reported finding evidence that the HIV virus lurks in inactive white blood cells in patients who have been taking the drug cocktail for up to three years and seem otherwise virtually free of the virus.

Two papers, by researchers from four different laboratories, will be published Friday in the journal Science. Another paper, by scientists at the National Institutes of Health, will be published later this month in the Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences.

Combinations of drugs that block two enzymes that the HIV virus uses to reproduce have been enormously effective in stopping the infection. In thousands of patients, HIV virus in the bloodstream has been reduced to near undetectable levels, and CD4 blood cells, the principal target of HIV, have rallied to normal levels. The success of the drugs raised hopes by some experts that HIV could be eradicated completely from the bodies of patients.

"Although we held out hope that the eradication hypothesis might pan out, I don't think that people really thought it would," said Dr. Joel Gallant of Johns Hopkins University, one of the co-authors of a paper in Science.

Despite the disappointment, Dr. Robert F. Siliciano of Johns Hopkins said that studies did find good news. He said none of the latent viruses studied had developed a resistance to the drug cocktail that has so successfully controlled the infection. This means, he said, that as long as HIV patients continue to carefully and diligently take the three-drug cocktail "they have an excellent chance of surviving the infection for a long time without developing symptoms of the disease."

All three of the studies found the latent virus in what are called resting CD4 lymphocytes. These are immune system white blood cells that are primed to defend against antigens from bacteria or from other foreign molecules. Until they encounter antigens that are their specific target, the blood cells are inactive, or resting.

Unabomber trial jurors questioned

By Richard Cole
Associated Press

SACRAMENTO, Calif. — The defense struggle to save Theodore Kaczynski's life continued to dominate jury selection in the Unabomber trial today, as the defendant closely watched the faces of those who will decide his fate.

When questioning of prospective jurors resumed this morning, one of the first to be interviewed said he was a supporter of capital punishment, and said he believed that Kaczynski was probably guilty of the charges against him.

"From what I saw... he was the one that did it," the man said. "I guess I'm not committed to it, but it appears that way." But another prospect confessed tearfully that she could not impose execution under any circumstances.

"I could not vote to put a man to death," she said, crying. "I'm sorry."

Kaczynski, 55, faces a 10-count federal indictment in four of the Unabomber's 16 bomb attacks between 1978 and 1995. The four bombings killed two Sacramento men and left two professors disabled.

The math professor turned recluse, arrested last year at his remote Montana cabin, could face the death sentence if convicted. He also faces a later trial in a fatal New Jersey bombing. Eleven jury candidates were interviewed Wednesday, the first day of jury questioning, and four were excused for hardship or cause. Prosecutors and the defense will seat a panel of 12 jurors and six alternates. Jury selection was expected to last a month. On Wednesday, defense lawyer Judy Clarke fired repeated questions at a Rush Limbaugh fan who said he favored capital punishment because "the recidivism rate after the death penalty is zero." But the man insisted he would follow the law and the judge's instructions, and he was not dismissed.

Also allowed to stay was an elderly man who said the death penalty "does not serve a useful purpose." When pressed, the man said he could impose death, because "it is the law of the land." While jury candidates marched in and out Wednesday, some of the key action took place on paper. The defense filed documents opposing a motion from prosecutors that seeks to bar Kaczynski from offering a mental defect defense.

U.S. District Judge Garland Burrell has yet to rule on whether he will allow such a defense.

Prosecutors oppose the mental defect defense partly because Kaczynski has refused to submit to government-selected psychiatric testing. They say without that, they cannot counter expert testimony from the defense.

The defense said prosecutors can adequately prepare by having their experts review other materials, including Kaczynski's writings.

"The government does not seek to level the playing field, but essentially asks for a guilty verdict and a death sentence before the trial begins," the defense argued in the papers.

U.S. to issue gold dollar

WASHINGTON — The dollar's going gold and the quarter's getting a face lift under legislation passed by the House yesterday and sent to President Clinton.

The bill, passed by voice vote, authorizes the treasury secretary to create a gold-colored dollar to replace the Susan B. Anthony dollar as well as new quarters honoring the 50 states. Beginning in 1999, Treasury will issue five new quarters a year, each commemorating a state. The states will be honored in the order they entered the union.

"This program will not only be educational for people of all ages, and promote pride among our states, but it will make getting change a lot more interesting," said Rep. Michael Castle, (R-Del.), sponsor of the legislation.

The head of George Washington will remain on one side of the quarters, with the other side, now carrying the American eagle, to carry designs distinctive to the states. They will be designed by the treasury secretary together with state officials, the Citizens Commemorative Coin Advisory Committee and the Commission on Fine Arts.

The bill, which has already been approved by the Senate, directs the secretary not to choose any frivolous or inappropriate designs. It does not say who or what should replace suffragist Susan B. Anthony on the face of the dollar coin. That design is left up to the Treasury secretary. The Anthony coins, minted from 1979 to 1981, have been largely unpopular, partly because they look and feel too much like a quarter.

Paper dollars will continue to be printed.

"While I think many Americans will use a dollar coin if it is easier to distinguish from the quarter, the general public is not ready to part with the dollar bill," Castle said.

Death penalty fails in unjust system

When the Massachusetts House of Representatives voted on whether or not to reinstate the death penalty, something that has not been in use since 1975, they were voting on a bill which would radically alter the legal landscape which exists today. For instance, in a case such as that of Louise Woodward, she may be on death row now, despite juror's claims that they cannot be sure whether or not she is truly guilty. The death penalty is not merely an inappropriate form of punishment for those convicted of murder, it is also an assignment of responsibility to those who would enact the bill and those who would apply the bill. The attempted passage of this bill was an opportunity created by a collection of heinous crimes over the past year, which have raised doubts in people's minds to whether or not the death penalty is a bad idea or not.

Nathan Mealey

The answer to that question is an unequivocal "yes," the death penalty is a bad idea. For two reasons in particular. The first is that it is a measure which is intended to deter crime. Yet, historically it has had little to no effect in doing so. In this instance, the death penalty would ultimately serve no purpose, since if it is not going to deter crime, what good is it going to do? Provide mental gratification to those suffering the anguish of losing a loved one to a murder? Again, research has been done which has disproved this theory, showing that the death penalty in fact provides little gratification when all is said and done. If the death penalty can serve neither of these purposes, then is it really something that should be adopted in Massachusetts?

The second reason for arguing against the validity of the death penalty has to do with the state of the legal system in the United States. Punishment such as the death penalty can truly only be deemed appropriate when the legal system itself is perfectly just. Again, consider the case of Louise Woodward. What if she is not guilty, as she claims and in fact the prosecution had a difficult time disproving? If the death penalty were in effect, and she had been sentenced to death, the state would be licensing the killing of someone for whom there were doubts as to their guilt. The state would be executing someone who was not necessarily guilty (although the truth may never be revealed one way or the other) and who is only 19 years old. If the state of Massachusetts says that you are not responsible enough to buy alcohol until the age of 21, an age typically considered adulthood, then how can the state convict you based on your being responsible for your actions at 19, if they will not consider you an adult until you are 21? Even more so, the bill which was presented before the House would have allowed the execution of anyone aged 14 or older. How can the state justify its representation of people as non-adults until they are 21, but try them as adults when they are 14? But, returning to the state of our legal system, it is certainly not unheard of for an innocent person to be convicted of a crime, neither is it unheard of for them to be sentenced to death. Take for instance the case of Mumiaa Abu-Jamal, a journalist who in 1982 was charged with the murder of a police officer in Philadelphia, Pa. In a trial which bordered on the obscene, Jamal was convicted and sentenced to death. As soon as the case ended, early in 1985, evidence disproving Jamal's guilt began to surface. Soon a mound of evidence stood in contradiction to his guilty conviction, and his lawyer began filing appeals. Today, 15 years after his conviction, he still sits on death row. Not only have his appeals fallen on deaf ears, they have fallen on the same ears of Judge Sabo, who conveniently has had all of Jamal's appeals routed to his courtroom. Sabo is the same judge who presided over the initial trial, in which (as can be proven today) evidence was tampered with and hidden, testimonies were coerced, and Jamal himself was not allowed to speak in his defense. Mind you, it is not that he chose not to speak on his own behalf, he was physically restrained from doing so. Today, his appeals are still pending. But nonetheless he remains on death row, awaiting his execution. His trial is known internationally as a perversion of justice. And it all occurred in the U.S. legal system. it is simply an example of the injustice which our legal system, any legal system, is capable of. With this being the case, can we honestly say that the death penalty is just? Can we possibly say that it is right to legitimize the existence of the death penalty, in the context of a legal system which is clearly flawed, and incapable of assuring a fair, impartial trial?

Surely, there are innocent victims of crime in the United States. But, there are also innocent victims of the legal system. The Massachusetts House of Representatives vote on this bill resulted in an 80–80 deadlock, which in effect defeated the bill. In the end, the passage or failure of this bill came down to one representative, who switched his vote, changing an 81–79 passage of the bill, to a defeat. This representative took a step forward to assert the reality that our legal system cannot be trusted with the responsibility inherent in giving it the death penalty, to use at its whim.

Essential moral values

On a recent rainy Wednesday afternoon I went to the Black Sheep bakery to get some studying done. Hoping to take advantage of what little outdoor light there was, I took a seat facing the window that, incidentally, was next to the trash can. After a few minutes had passed, a young woman came around and attempted to deposit her garbage bag into the trash barrel, somehow managing to miss the can entirely and instead spraying the contents of her half-eaten sandwich in a wide arc across the floor. Obeying the laws of physics, a large blob of mayonnaise did not follow the aforementioned arc and instead came to an unceremonious halt directly beneath my chair. The woman looked up at me meekly, uttered a detached "Whoops, sorry" and then scurried off. Certain she had gone to get some napkins to clean up her mess, I was quite surprised when, through the window, I saw her climb into a car with two of her buddies and drive off.

Jason Davis

Now, you might not expect that this incident would trigger anything other than mild disgust, but it managed to put me into a philosophical mindset for quite a while. After a little thought, I concluded that this little mishap was a perfect, everyday example of a problem in our society that is too infrequently addressed.

This leads me to a word which many of you, with very good reason, probably find utterly distasteful. That word is morals.

Before you tear up this newspaper in rage and disgust, let me explain that I wish to make a clear differentiation between two different categories of moral values.

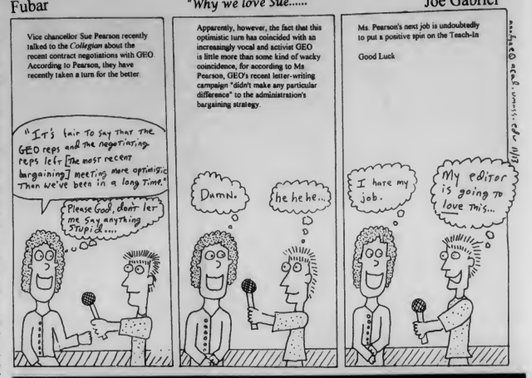
The first group encompasses those beliefs that are infrequently though of as being "traditional" in American culture. This includes some downright silly ideas, such as making premarital sex into a "sin," which have given real moral values a bad name. It hasn't helped that a certain breed of obnoxious "family values" politician has seized upon these distorted morals and turned them into an election year crusade of Good vs. Evil.

Because modern society has hopelessly entangled morals with Sunday school repression, many of us have made a deliberate effort to purge them from our lives. One line of reasoning insists that because all morals are relative, having no morals at all is just as good as anything else.

There are, however, moral values that are not relative, are not tied to any one religious doctrine, but instead cut across all realms of spiritual thought and human culture.

Something that we frequently forget is to treat other living creatures with basic kindness. This does not mean that you should never be critical of someone, or that you must never kill an annoying mosquito. It is simply recognition of the essential value that other beings, be they mice, trees or human beings, have in and of themselves.

I realize that this point could be debated endlessly, but I stand firm with the notion that human beings, on the whole, have become far too self-centered. Whether it is an offensive and loud neighbor keeping people awake, or a shopping mall developer who sees nothing wrong with destroying fragile wetlands, we humans have a lot to learn about living with a kind and humble attitude. On a larger scale, the results can be seen in misplaced military aggression, the massive, widening gulf between the rich and the poor, and in global ecological destruction.



One moral value that has been thoroughly ignored, and even scorned by modern society is the idea that we should limit our consumption in order so that others do not have to live in constant suffering. Although you may hear otherwise, it is a fact that there is a limited amount of material wealth on this planet. While this material wealth is very great, it is not so great that we can be as greedy as we choose without affecting the well being of either nature or of other humans.

It is also well known that we have an almost unlimited desire to obtain more material wealth, even when we live perfectly comfortably. Tragically, our economic, social and political systems are designed to encourage this desire, and to harness it in the eternal attempt to "create" ever more wealth. This, as you know, simply and effectively divides us into economic winners and losers, and the winners always gain to the detriment of the losers.

The list could go on. It is important to remember that precisely because so many of the problems we face stem from warped moral values, they are amenable to change. Healing our inner selves will inevitably lead to a better outer world.

Letters to the Editor

Supporting GEO in the interest of all

To the Editor:

Supporting the Graduate Employee Organization in its struggle to win a fair and equitable contract from the administration is not solely an act of political conviction on my part as an undergraduate, but also one of self-interest.

I am amazed at the profound ways that graduate teaching assistants effect my academic experience as an undergraduate. One-fourth of my classes have directly leaders, or all of the above. Had I not been a transfer or had I not taken so many courses at the other four colleges, I am sure this percentage would be higher, like many of my undergraduate peers' experiences. In this way GEO members, who are our TAs, TOs and ARDs, are essential to the quality of our lives as undergraduates. They have played the role of intellectual and academic mentors, provided us with course content as well as additional resources on how to enter graduate school, offered counselling on professional and career concerns, and have been understanding of our individual academic and personal needs when evaluating our work and helping us learn.

How else have graduate students affected me in their role as Teaching Assistant? The first time I ever had a teacher who wasn't white was here at UMass. Sadly enough my hometown of Redding, Conn., full of all its "educated" white folk, for some mystical reason didn't have the sense to include in its teaching staff any person from a racial minority. Though the administration agrees there need to be more graduate students who are from racial minorities they haven't done enough to make any real changes. GEO's contract includes demands for more TAs of color.

GEO's struggle to gain a fair wage agreement, Affirmative Action concessions, the creation of a flexible child care center, and an expansion of their basic medical coverage are not frills or irrational proposals. They are necessary to properly sustain those of us undergrads who wonder if they should support the GEO campaign for settling a fair contract, to tell the administration your education is important to you and so must then be those who are committed to teaching you.

But seriously... let's keep Maine

To the Editor:

This letter is in response to the editorial by Seema Gangatirkar "Sale today, California" (Nov. 12).

Ms. Gangatirkar's idea of selling 'useless' states is neither good nor funny. If the idea doesn't seem ridiculous enough, how about the fact that she presumed to pick, "without prejudice," states that we could all do without. I'm sure that most students would be not be pleased with her trying to make this sound like a fathomable idea. That is her first mistake. Her second is to assume that she knows anything about these states. Has she ever even been to these states?

First of all, I'm 99 percent sure that she hasn't even been to the places in Maine that she touted as 'gorgeous'— the obvious tourist traps. For her information, Maine does not merely have L.L. Bean outlets, Maine has the only major L.L. Bean store in the world, where it all began in the early 1900's. She probably doesn't know that this store is open 24 hours a day, 365 days a year; does she think this might have had something to do with the multibillion dollar success of the company?

Gangatirkar says that Maine has nothing to offer. How about that boost to the economy? That's just one company. What about paper companies that produce the paper the Collegian publishes Gangatirkar's editorials on? What about the American Skiing Company, that owns every major mountain from Vermont to Maine? As for other things Maine has to offer, how about top colleges like Bowdoin, Bates, and Colby, or the UMaine system?

I'm sure that one could find plenty of people from other states willing to defend them just as I have. I would have if I knew anything about those states. Unlike Gangatirkar, I do not presume to know about them. Maybe some other students would care to enlighten her, so we won't have to entertain any more of these ridiculous ideas.

GEO settlement not so close

To the Editor:

The Collegian headline of the Wednesday, Nov. 12 cover story which reads, "GEO and Administration come closer to agreement," misleads the reader to believe a settlement is right around the corner. After 20 months of negotiations, the Administration has finally made some movement in a positive direction, but our substantive issues (educational access, affordable childcare, livable wages and adequate healthcare) remain unresolved. While we too look forward to a speedy resolution of our contract, such a settlement will be contingent upon the Administration's continued movement in the right direction.

Media needs to speak on Iraqi position

To the Editor:

For the U.S. an important confrontation is building at the United Nations over Iraq. Iraqi officials are insisting on a date for the ending of United Nation sanctions because responsible U.S. officials have publicly stated that as far as the U.S. is concerned, sanctions will not end so long as Saddam Hussein rules in Iraq. Therefore, Iraq feels justified in charging U.S. members of the United Nations Inspection teams with endlessly inventing and creating confrontations; that they are instructed by U.S. officials to find ways and means of provoking the Iraqi officials to acts calculated to justify the continuation of sanctions.

Iraq is taking the matter of its' ban on U.S. members of the Inspection teams to the U.N. Security Council because it believes the U.S. position — tying the end of sanctions to Saddam Hussein's removal from power — it is a violation of the United Nations Charter and makes a mockery of long established, global rules of conduct forbidding any nation from interfering in the internal affairs of another.

The media has largely been silent on the central point of the Iraqi position. This is unfortunate because the Security Council is not likely to take lightly the United Nations being a party to such a blatant, high level attempt at determining who rules in Iraq. Already sentiment within the United Nations is heavily weighted against the continuation of sanctions against Iraq. If Iraq is able to prove that U.S. members of the Inspection teams have acted improperly in carrying out the mandate given them, the U.S. may be in for a major defeat in the world body.

The media's failure to prepare Americans for this possibility by refusing to fully report the Iraqi position will contribute to the growing loss of confidence of the American people in the role of the press, radio and TV.

NoHo hosts hardcore event

COURTESY JOHN FALLS

Hardcore legends Sick of it All hit Pearl Street tomorrow night.

By Adam Dlugacz
Collegian Staff

So you are a typical hardcore kid and you came to UMass with all these hopes of great shows... and there was nothing. Sure, there have been a handful of decent shows, but you've all been waiting for that show you had to go to to come around. Well your time has come. Tomorrow night at Pearl Street in Northampton, the hardcore event of the semester arrives as H2O, Sick Of It All, and the Misfits hit the Valley.

H2O have been around for five years, and after two albums, two 7's, and countless tours they have proven they can swing with the big boys. H2O's first self titled album on Blackout Records immediately captured the ears of the hardcore community by combining the melodies of the D.C. and California punk scenes with an attitude that could only come from New York. H2O championed standing up for yourself, being an individual, supporting your friends, and being a part of the hardcore community.

This year H2O released their second LP Thicker Than Water on Epitaph Records. Despite the change in labels, H2O came back with a vengeance and a sound that was more in your face and raw then their first LP. Embracing the sounds of hardcore/punk pioneers like Minor Threat, 7 Seconds, The Clash, and the Descendants, Thicker Than Water is easily one of the albums of the year. However, as amazing as they are on record it hardly compares to H2O's live show. Frontman Toby Morse is an absolute nut on stage and the band is tighter than New York City gridlock. You know it's a treat when a band as good as this is opening.

Sick Of It All, at this point in their careers, may just be the biggest band in hardcore. Sick Of It All has attained their position through respect, great song writing, and the fact that they may be the best live show ever. Sick Of It All started off as a small hardcore band out of Queens in the mid-'80s, whose first release was an EP on Revelation Records. Since then they've released four classic full lengths and have signed to Atlantic Records. But unlike most bands who have been around as long as Sick Of It All, they never lost sight of their goals, they never lost their integrity, they never tried to be what they're not or let their success get to their heads. It is for those reasons that kids everywhere flock to every Sick Of It All show.

Last year Sick Of It All released "Built To Last," the title alone being a true testament to what they are, and even though it's their fourth full-length album, it is easily one of their best. While most bands try to progress with their sound, Sick Of It All remembered what punk was about and released an album of 14 go for your throat hardcore anthems. Live, Sick Of It All is still one of the most intense bands around with classics like "Clobberin Time," "Pushed Too Far," "Pay The Price," "My Life," and "Friends Like You" joining newer songs like "Scratch The Surface," "Step Down," and "Built To Last."

Okay by now you are probably drooling all over yourself and wondering how you will be able to walk after Saturday when you realize there is still one more band. That's right, the Misfits back from the dead. For those of you who don't back in the day when bands like Minor Threat, Black Flag, the Descendants, Circle Jerks, Bad Brains were forming this whole punk rock hardcore shindig, the Misfits were right there with them.

While most punk bands were espousing individuality and going against the grain, the Misfits were actually doing it. Clad in make up and leather outfits and singing about the dead, torture chambers, raping and pillaging, the Misfits were not a band readily embraced by the Christian Right movement.

Even though the Misfits broke up in the '80s, and although Danzig is too busy trying to be serious to sing for them the Misfits are back. While their last album was well received it is the older material, that we will be there for. The Misfits were a band who made an impact on almost all punk and hardcore bands today because while they were scary and weird they had a sense of humor and an ability to write some great songs.

H2O, Sick Of It All, and the Misfits play at Pearl Street Night in Northampton tomorrow night, tickets are $15. The doors open at 7 p.m. and the show is all ages.

The different reasons why we watch films

Why do we go to the movies? I've thought about this question many times and I understand the answer is different for each of us. Some of us look at films critically, while others just wish to enjoy the sheer entertainment that movies can offer. In a movie theater we can witness every range of emotion and live vicariously through situations that could never occur in our real lives.

The same of course could be said about a novel or even a television program. Yet, what separates these distinct mediums is the magnitude that film offers when viewed in a theater. I am not talking about celebrities and our fascinations with them or even the whole idea of Hollywood and the images of the movie star and how we associate these concepts with power, fame, and even to some extent the American dream. These concepts, in my opinion, have ruined the innocence and integrity of movie-making, substituting the desire to tell a story creatively with the desire to merely make a blockbuster. But even more importantly, why did film have to turn from creative expression to a $1 billion business? In general, why must passion be put aside so that someone can take the risk of becoming rich?

With all bitterness behind, I, along with millions of people every week still go to the movies. Still we must admit, when was the last time any of us were truly blown away by what we saw? We all look for different things and each of us can read the same film countless ways. I recently discussed Starship Troopers with my roommate, as we both argued what the film really meant and how well it made its point. I found the film to be an irresponsible display of fascist politics and gruesome violence. A film which was unsure if it wanted to be a great commentary on war and propaganda or if it just used those criticisms as backdrops for the cast of "90210" going to war.

My roommate was able to see the film's entertainment value and accept it as such. How could we see the same film and have such different points of view? Neither of us are right or wrong— its just our opinion— but it made me think about why we go to the movies. Do we are made to reach countless except to learn target audiences, and the about our society success of and humanity or do reasons why so many are unsuccessful we just want to lose ourselves within is more than just a matter of opinion. the story?

Adam Levine

As we sit and view a film in a theater, something miraculous occurs. The lights begin to dim, images form on the screen, we clutch our popcorn containers and candy bar wrappers and anticipate what we have in store for us. For approximately two hours we can forget who we are and even where we are. The outside world is incidental and forgiven to us, as we watch a story unfold literally before our very own eyes. Film is important for these reasons, it gives us opportunities to peacefully escape everyday life and indulge in the truest sense of the concept of entertainment.

Obviously, how we view these films is quite unique to every individual. As in the case of my roommate and myself, we realized each of us anticipate certain things from viewing a film that may not be important to others. Whereas many of us come to expect that a film should have underlining messages the majority of us assume a film should be taken for face value unless of course its purpose is obvious. We can read into anything as deeply as we desire which doesn't mean that that was the director and screenwriters points, yet at least film is communicative medium worthy of discussion.

I do not have the answers to the questions I have raised, other than the fact that people simply enjoy movies for their own personal reasons. Film is a craft, as well as a theoretical art form, and it should be appreciated on each of these levels. Different movies

The industry does not look favorably on the freedom of expression if they feel it may not sell. This is an entirely whole other argument but the ramifications are apparent and the quality thus suffers.

What is important is why do we still go see them? Is it because we just like the idea of going to the movies? That we can appreciate them for whatever they can provide? Or do we need movies to offer a separate, more manipulated reality, to take our minds of the reality that we must continuously confront. These reasons, I suppose, are what keep film interesting and worthy of discussion. If we all view a film for different reasons than this particular medium is given more depth and should thus be taken as seriously as all other forms of art. Anyway, for whatever reason you wish: keep cinema alive!

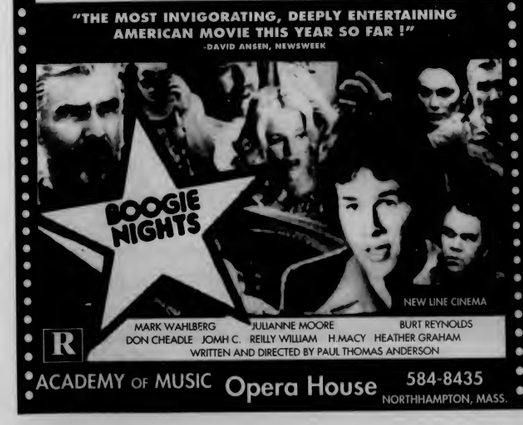
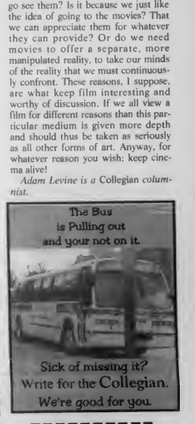
Tabla player visits UMass



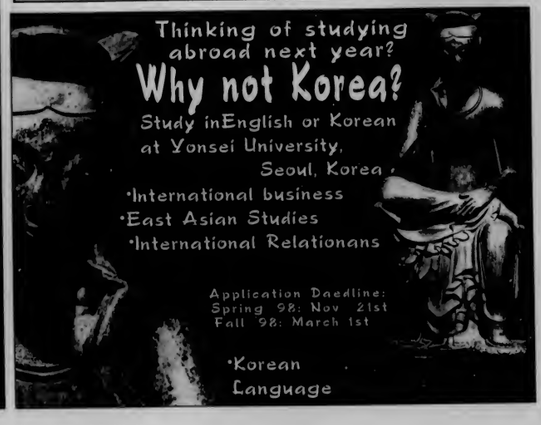
By Emily Trask
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Asian Dance and Music Program presents Maestro Ali Akbar Khan and Pandit Swapan Chaudhuri, one of the world's finest Tabla players, who will give a special concert in celebration of the 50th anniversary of the independence of India and Pakistan.



Ali Akbar Khan's family traces its ancestral tradition in music to Mian Tansen, a 16th century musical genius and the court musician of Emperor Akbar. His father, Allauddin Khan, is recognized as the greatest figure in North Indian Classical Music in the 20th century. Born in 1922 in East Bengal (Bangladesh), Ali Akbar Khan began his musical studies at the age of three, gave his first public performance at age 13, and in his early 20s became the court musician of the Maharajah of Jodhpur. Since this auspicious beginning, Khan has gone on to win the highest artistic awards in India and also in his adopted homeland, the United States. Having won both the "President of India" medal (twice) and the Padma Vibhushan, Khan is regarded as a "National Living Treasure" by the government of India. In the United States, Khan has been awarded the prestigious MacArthur Fellowship, the "genius grant," and this summer it was announced that he was awarded a National Heritage Foundation Fellowship.

Ali Akbar Khan's playing of the Sarod–a long–necked lute, which is richer in sound and has a greater dynamic range than it better–know cousin, the Sitar is distinguished by his expressive use of implied harmonic effects, by his startling, seemingly spontaneous use of stops and intervals, and by the electrifying, and often explosive, instrumental effects he is able to coax from his instrument. Swapan Chaudhuri is Khan's lon–time accompanist, and his Tabla playing follows the virtuosic displays in Khan's performance with a vigor and excitement that must be seen to be believed. As the drummer, Chaudhuri's role is not just to keep the beat, but to provide a complex counterpoint around which the notes of the Sarod will flow. A concert by Ali Akbar Khan and Swapan Chaudhuri is an experience in many levels of music, as their music is simultaneously playful and profound.



Tickets for Maestro Ali Akbar Khan and Pandit Swapan Chaudhuri are $20 and $15, with $5 tickets available for students and children under 17. Call the Fine Arts Center Box Office at 545–2511 or 1–800–999–UMAS for tickets or information. Bowker Auditorium is located in Stockbridge Hall.

B Sharp swings into the Valley

By Emily Trask
Collegian Staff

Jazz for a Sunday Night will be the theme as the California-based B Sharp Jazz Quartet, makes one musical appearance in the Student Union ballroom at the University of Massachusetts on Sunday at 8 p.m. This free show is sponsored by Something Every Friday — a series of special events on the UMass campus. Also featured on the program will be the UMass jazz performers, "The Art Gecko Sextet."

The B Sharp Jazz Quartet is led by drummer Herb Graham Jr. and features saxophonist Randell Willis, pianist Rodney Lee and bassist Osamu Afifi. This band has been hailed as one of the brightest hopes for the future of acoustic jazz and after three years together, the group is breaking through to new levels of artistry and popular appeal.

Their fourth and latest album, "Tha Go 'Round" marks a high point in the bands development. According to drummer, composer, and founder Herb Graham Jr., "it's a snapshot of where we are now." The members are "willing to be more expressive... and speak in a voice they have developed over the course of the past several releases."

The B Sharp Jazz Quartet has cultivated a very diverse audience (from hard-core jazz heads to younger modern rockers). This summer, the band played its first European tour, including Holland's world-famous North Sea Jazz Festival, the Molde Jazz Festival in Norway, The International Istanbul Jazz Festival, and the Umbria and Pescara jazz Fests in Italy. These dates come at a time when the band is being booked into major domestic jazz festivals as well Monterey, San Jose, and the Detroit Montreux Jazz Festival, to name a few.

Nothing, however, came easy. B Sharp has paid its dues over the past few years with an indie-rock-styled road schedule, playing jazz clubs, rock clubs, colleges and more. "This band is a working band," says drummer Herb Graham. "We've made a conscious effort to be out on the road. Sometimes that means playing to a jazz audience and sometimes it means playing to a guy with orange hair and a ring in his eyebrow-and frankly, I like them both."

The band incorporates everything from hip-hop to alternative rock in their creative improvisation, and are on a mission to attract the disaffected from the predictable rock, pop, and alternative scene while keeping long-time jazz devotees satisfied. After years of working on this incorporation and several years on the road, B-Sharp is maintaining their commitment to the lineage that runs back through Miles and Trane.

This program is sponsored by Something Every Friday at the University Massachusetts. For more information please call Joseph Tolson at 545-3600.

Britain goes hip with "Cool Britannia"

By Maureen Johnson
Associated Press

LONDON — The Lord Chancellor wants to shed his black silk tights and long white wig. The prime minister entertains French leaders in a steel-and-glass skyscraper with not an Old Master in sight. His wife ruffles traditionalists by wearing trousers to lunch with Queen Elizabeth II at Balmoral Castle.

It's all part of "Cool Britannia," the Old Country going hip, shaking off its theme-park image of castles, tweeds, titles, stodgy food, class divisions, pretty green fields and royal pageantry.

For Prime Minister Tony Blair, the modernization of Britain — "New Britain" is the official buzzword — is more than a PR exercise.

It's a rebranding mission, backed up with think tanks, Web sites, design awards and grand plans for the millennium to reflect this nation as a pacesetter in the stuff of the '90s, from telecommunications to fashion to global financial services.

"I want people like you to admire Britain for what we are, not for what we have been," Blair told leaders of the 54-nation Commonwealth of Britain and its former colonies, meeting in Edinburgh last month.

On that occasion — the first big international event in the Scottish capital since Blair's Labor Party swept to power in May — bands of pipes, drums and swirling kilts were out.

Instead, premiers and presidents watched a country some still associate with plumed governors and "Rule Britannia" projecting itself through glitzy videos, flashing Internet images and xylophones.

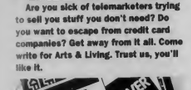
And that's not the half of it.

The British Tourist Authority has started using the slogan "Cool Britannia" and, in September, jazzed up its logo, adding a touch of yellow and green around the red, white and blue of the Union Jack.

British Airways, now the world's biggest international carrier, this summer replaced its Union Jack-style tail logos with an array of colorful designs from around the world.

The Lord Chancellor, the country's chief legal officer, yearns to look like an American or continental judge, wearing just his own hair and a simple gown instead of his daily 17-century garb of wig, short pants, silk stockings and buckle shoes.

And the treasury chief, Chancellor of the Exchequer Gordon Brown, raised eyebrows by attending a black-tie dinner as guest of honor in a business suit.



Critics accuse the Labor administration — led by the 44-year-old Blair, Britain's youngest prime minister this century — of trashing tradition and succumbing to faddishness.

"It's a silly phase. A government is not an advertising agency," Douglas Hurd, the former foreign secretary in the defeated Conservative Party government, told BBC radio. "Most of the things we are good at are rooted in the past."

However, much of Britain's pomp and pageantry is the result of a 19th-century version of brand-imaging — put together by the Victorians, citizens of a great industrial and imperial power with a widowed, reclusive queen.

"It was the means of projecting the might and majesty of Britain behind a sad, frumpy, little old lady who went into her shell because her consort was dead," says Peter Walker, president-elect of Britain's Institute of Public Relations. "It worked."

Big Ass Truck is diversity

KENT
Big Ass Truck
Upstart Records

Whether they're called Big Butt Truck or Large Derriere Vehicle, doesn't really matter. Big Ass Truck pretty much kicks ass, period.

On their second, and most recent album, Kent (Upstart Records), this sextet mixes such a varied plethora of musical styles that it makes them virtually impossible to categorize — which makes for an interesting listening experience.

Although their sound certainly brings to mind the musical style of the Red Hot Chili Peppers with songs like "Sweetness" and "Theem From," Big Ass Truck still manage to remain distinctly different.

The Memphis-based band's diverse array of instrumentation, which not only includes the usual guitars/bass/drums, but also an organ, keyboards, horns and even a DJ whose turntable scratching adds it's own cool sound to the mix. Combined with their unique blend of soul, hip hop, r&b, rock and ska makes them a rather impressive lot.

Kent's infectious rhythm and pulse-pounding beat, along with the influences of the six eclectic members, make for one funky album. Though for the time-being their following may be small and mainly local/home-based, more and more people are beginning to appreciate their musical prowess. This branching out has clearly helped — this week they played the Iron Horse in nearby Northampton.

After listening to the constant bombardment of sound and music, the listener will no doubt feel like they just got hit head-on by a big ass truck. B (Christina Morais)

Men's XC at NCAA qualifier

By Scott Hamill
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's cross-country team wraps up their season this weekend with the NCAA District One qualifier meet tomorrow. The Minutemen have had a relatively successful season, placing fifth in the Atlantic 10, after they were predicted to finish seventh. The A-10 Championships two weeks ago produced success, with senior Ryan Carrara finishing tenth — his first All-Conference berth.

Now UMass faces it's biggest meet of the season, running against all Division I schools in New England and New York. Of the 35 teams in the meet, two will qualify for the National Championship, with a possible third team gaining a wild card berth.

Coach Ken O'Brien predicts that his team will finish somewhere around 15th, which would please him. "I'd like to see five guys in the top 100," O'Brien said. He's looking for his star, Carrara, to finish in the top 25-30, and would like to see the next four runners no more than a minute behind.

He sees his goal of 15th overall as a modest one, as his team has worked hard the past two weeks.

"These two weeks have been as good as the two weeks prior to the A-10s," O'Brien said. He is concerned as to how his young team will do in the meet. "They've all run six or seven meets, but each meet is new for all of them," he said, implying that each course has its own unique features that the runners have not encountered yet.

Overall, O'Brien is pleased with his team's performance so far this season, and is looking to this meet as a means for more experience for his young team.

UMass polo in ECAC tournament

By Jim Eltringham
Collegian Staff

The No. 10 Massachusetts men's water polo team will have a chance to end their season with a win at this weekend's Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference (ECAC) Tournament. For the Minutemen (23-9, 7-2 Collegiate Water Polo Association), this competition will be both the capper of a successful 1997 season and an early beginning for the 1998 campaign.

UMass is coming off a second place finish in the CWPA Eastern Championships last weekend, falling to Queens, 10- 9, in the title game. The heartbreaking loss left the Minutemen out of the NCAA Tournament for the first time in five years

"Next season starts right now," said UMass coach Russ Yarworth of his squad's heartbreaking defeat. "We're not going to nationals, but we're starting the work for going to [next year's] nationals this weekend."

With only a pair of seniors (co-captains J.C. Limardo and Marc Staudenbauer) departing due to graduation, the 1998 squad will be very similar to this year's edition — with the possible exception of a more intense hunger.

"Maybe this year during practices we had the complacency of champions at times, and now we won't have that," Yarworth said. "When you're the team chasing the team that won [the title], the motivation factor's a little higher."

"I'm not dumping on the kids — they worked hard and probably played the games of their lives [last weekend.] But when you're the challenger... you're playing to win, whereas the champion sometimes plays not to lose."

Though it's a consolation tournament, the ECAC competition will feature several top-flight teams, including George Washington, and Bucknell. First round play will commence on Saturday, and UMass will begin "next year" by battling Villanova and George Washington in the opening round, with the championship game on Sunday. The competition will be hosted by Brown University.

Pats and Bucs try to find September form

By Fred Goodall
Associated Press

TAMPA, Fla. — The games grow in magnitude each week, and so does the anticipation.

The New England Patriots, seeking the form of last year's AFC champions, take on the Tampa Bay Buccaneers, inching closer to ending a NFL-record streak of 14 consecutive losing seasons.

The teams were the toast of the NFL through September, only to hit lulls last month that both feel are behind them. The Patriots (6-4) stopped a three-game losing streak last week, while the Bucs (7-3) have won two straight in halting a similar skid.

"Everyone goes through those periods. You like to win as you're going through them, but nobody plays to that high level for 16 weeks. That's the goal. That's what you shoot for. But it's hard to do," Tampa Bay coach Tony Dungy said.

"I was on a team (in Pittsburgh) that won a Super Bowl, and we were 14-2. And we went through that period where you weren't playing as well as you wanted to, but you were still able to win."

Still, the Patriots and Bucs are in a good position heading into Sunday's first meeting between the teams in nine years. New England is tied for first in the AFC East and Tampa Bay trails Green Bay and Minnesota by one game in the NFC Central.

A Bucs victory would be a milestone: the team would clinch its first non-losing season since 1982, while also taking a big step toward earning its first playoff berth in the same period.

For the Patriots, the struggle is to establish a new identity under first-year coach Pete Carroll, whose methods are constantly compared to those of Bill Parcells, who led New England to the Super Bowl last season.

"There's an obvious contrast that can be made, and has been made, and will continue to be made. He is such a strong figure, and has been so successful, and has such a unique and obvious style, that it really makes it easy to compare with anybody," Carroll said.

The Bucs have answered skeptics who questioned whether they could win consistently on the road by compiling a 4-1 record after winning just once away from home last season. They're 4-0 in domed stadiums, historically tough venues for Tampa Bay, and only one Bucs team (1979) reached seven victories faster than this year's club.

put together a strong rookie campaign, finishing with 10.7 points and 4.1 assists per game. Now a sophomore, opponents will likely key on Van Huisen on the perimeter. Her off–season training could go a long way in helping her maintain the lofty standard she set for herself a year ago.

The Minutewomen will also look for junior Tez Kraft to return to the form she displayed before knee surgery sidelined her for a year and a half.

Monday's game allowed Minutewoman coach Joanie O'Brien the opportunity to play every healthy member of her squad (Lucia Madajova will likely be out until December with stress fractures and Jaywana Bradley will be out for the year).

O'Brien was also able to give significant playing time to her newcomers, even keeping them in the game during the last minutes to prepare them for future crunch situations.

"This game was about learning," O'Brien said. "The thing about exhibition games is a lesson I learned from Jack Leaman when I first started here: the team that wins the game is the team that learns the most."

Kara Trent, Kathy Coyner and Nicky Vallieres are UMass' three freshmen, all saw time at the two guard position. Rekiya Penton, a sophomore who sat out last season because of academic regulations, saw time at forward.

But O'Brien said her team still has things to learn.

"We got beat on some things," she said. "Our transition defense was poor and we missed a lot of free throws."

Those will be two key areas O'Brien will look at on Sunday, when the Minutewomen face off against Wagner. The two teams met last year, with UMass pulling out a 70– 67 overtime win at Sutter Gym.

"Wagner is not a real big team," O'Brien said. "They are athletic in the post and they have two or three 3-point shooters. They are a good solid basketball team. They might want some revenge after the way we won the game last year in their gym."

Van Huisen was UMass' second leading scorer against Wagner last year with 15 points and eight assists. Kara Tudman added seven points and three boards.

Minutemen skate for Alumni Cup

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

Redemption comes in many forms.

A five–cent bottle or can. A belated anniversary present of a dozen roses to your — once again — current girlfriend.

Or, more importantly, you get back at your sworn enemy with a real dastardly, underhanded trick.

That is what the Massachusetts hockey team will try to do once again to its logistical sister campus in Lowell tonight at the William D. Mullins Center (7 p.m.). After a tough 1–4 start to the season (0–3 in Hockey East), that began Oct. 24 with a 6–4 loss to the River Hawks in North Billerica, the Minutemen will be looking for sweet redemption in their hunt for their third consecutive Alumni Cup.

The Cup is awarded to the winner of the season series between the two campuses, and UMass is already down one game in their effort to win the honor reportedly created to boost Lowell as the "better" hockey program. If tradition and historical success are main factors in the judgment of the worth of a program, then maybe the River Hawks (4–2, 2–1 HE) have an edge on the Minutemen.

However, the fact of the matter is that UMass has been dastardly and under–handed, winning the first two editions of the Cup, and only a loss tonight will take that away from the campus in the Pioneer Valley.

For UMass coach Joe Mallen, he wants to use that home advantage to his advantage this weekend, and get the race for the Cup evened up at one game apiece.

"One thing that has sort of caught up to us is the fact we've only played one of our first five games at home this season," Mallen said. "We played well enough against Boston College [a 3–1 home opening loss], but not well enough to win. We want to use our home advantage to our advantage."

Last season's HE Rookie of the Year sophomore forward Greg Koehler picked up a hat trick in the season opener for both teams, helping him to the lead in scoring for Lowell (seven goals, two assists). Freshman Jeff Boulanger is three points behind Koehler (three goals, three assists), with five players tied at five points behind the two forwards.

For offensive success, the Minutemen will have to get more than 19 shots off on goaltender Martin Fillion, as they did in the season opener, due to the senior's more–than– mortal marks of a .867 save percentage and 3.43 goals–against–average going into their seventh game of the season.

After senior forward Tim Lovell (three goals, three assists) took the ice by storm in UMass' first three games, the senior co–captain was held scoreless last weekend in the team's split at Nebraska–Omaha. But, other players like senior Chris Fawcett, as well as junior Tim Hirsch's gamewinner in their 3–2 win last Friday night, got on the board for the Minutemen last weekend — a good sign for what has been properly defended by opponents as a one–line team.

Going into the Lowell game, and Saturday night's game in Schenectady, N.Y. against Union and their All–American goalie Trevor Koenig, the goal is to get more goals from other players on the team.

"We needed drastically to get some other guys in the scoring column, and right now, I feel that a couple of them are about to break out," Mallen said. "We have to face two good goaltenders this weekend, and it will be a situation for us to find a way to beat them.

"If you score on screens, tip–ins and rebounds, no matter how good a goalie is, they'll not be able to save those opportunities, and we've been working on that in practice."

V–ball faces crucial matches in A–10 play

By Jamie Jee
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts volleyball team will finish up their road schedule for the season after when take on Fordham and George Washington this weekend. Both matches will be crucial as a post–season berth is at stake for the Minutewomen.

UMass is currently one game behind the Colonials in the Atlantic 10 standings and if the Minutewomen string together two victories this weekend, they will still have to hope Virginia Tech and Duquesne fall, as they are also a game ahead of UMass.

Xavier is tied with the Minutewomen and the team hopes to see them drop out of contention this weekend. As it is, UMass no longer controls its own destiny and will have to cross their fingers.

The Minutewomen are certainly not ready to fold, however, and are looking to work harder than ever to do their part in a last–ditch tournament bid effort.

"We still have a positive attitude," coach Bonnie Kenny said. "We do know are backs are against the wall, though."

UMass has found itself in this position after losing to a strong Rhode Island squad and being edged out by Virginia Tech last weekend.

"We've been concentrating on fundamentals," Kenny said. "We've concentrated on our outside hitters, and we're going to let [Watters, Hogencamp, and Nolan] duke it out."

Last weekend sophomore outside hitter Sarah Watters totalled 25 kills and 32 digs for the Minutewomen while fellow sophomore outside hitter Kari Hogancamp added 12 kills and 16 digs in the loss to Virginia Tech. Both sophomore middle blocker Jill Meyers and senior outside hitter Lesley Nolan contributed by combining for 42 kills against the Hokies.

The team has continued to play well individually for the most part, but their train has been derailed lately due to a lack of combining those efforts to win several close matches.

"We haven't had all six players play well at the same time," Kenny said. The key for UMass this weekend will be team unity, probably for both playing and praying.

The Minutewomen will first face an underrated Fordham squad at Rose Hill Gym in the Bronx.

"Their outside hitters do a pretty good job," Kenny said. "Ours will have to be even better."

The Lady Rams are led by outside hitter Cindy Vojtech who leads the team in kills and hitting percentage. UMass will hope to shut her down with Meyers in the middle and move on to the marquee matchup versus the Colonials.

GW is 18–11 and have won four of their last five. They're led by sophomore outside hitter Theresa Ridder and have a dangerous freshman in team hitting leader Julia Iahnke. In this match as well, the theme will be containment. The Minutewomen remember how good this team can be if their hitters are not challenged early and often.

"GW is a tough squad and we're going to have to go all out," Kenny said. "We'll have to be hitting at least in the .200's to be in a position to win."

"That's all we can think about for these last four games," Meyers said. "We may not have fate but we still have desire."

by junior Shane Stafford. Stafford has thrown for 2,262 yards this season, 19 touchdowns and only eight interceptions. Junior Tory Taylor, who was Yankee Conference Rookie of the Year in 1995 as a tailback, has been converted to flanker. Taylor is averaging 17.9 yards per touch this season, with 42 receptions and 121 all– purpose yards per game.

"We need to make it difficult for them to throw the football... [but] the first thing we need to do is stop the run, and make some plays on the ball, which we've had trouble doing lately," Hodges said.

Bright spots for UMass have been few and far between. But the play of freshman tailback Marcel Shipp has given the Minutemen some hope for the years ahead. Shipp has gained 646 yards so far in 1997, and with 84 yards on Saturday Shipp will break the record for rushing yards by a freshman set in 1990 by John Johnson. According to Hodges, the feat has is even more remarkable considering Shipp has been battling a bad ankle all season.

"We've had a great tradition of running backs here [at UMass], and he certainly fits in with that tradition. I think he's going to have an outstanding career here," Hodges said.

Junior linebacker Khari Samuel's feats have been well documented locally, but Samuel has been honored on a national level for his play this season. The Sports Network announced on Tuesday that Samuel is one of 10 finalists for the Buck Buchanan award, given annually to the nation's top I–AA defensive player.

"It's amazing because these awards usually go to players on teams that are having great seasons," Hodges said. "We've had some great players here, and he's the first [to be up for the Buchanan award]. I think it's a tribute to him, and the hard work he's put in. I think he's very deserving."

goalie to the cage this time around. But Zowie Tucker is no stranger to tough games and top–notch opponents. The freshman keeper has seen most of the action in front of the UMass goal this season, and was not scored upon in last weekend's A–10 tournament.

UMass' route to the NCAAs was through the conference tourney. This is the first year the Atlantic 10 was awarded an automatic berth into the national event. Last year, a victory in a play–in game was necessary in order to advance.

Penn State won its way into the NCAA tournament by defeating Michigan in the Big 10 tournament, 2–1. The Nittany Lions and Wolverines shared the regular season league crown.

The Minutewomen will look to control the field of play early in the game, putting intense focus on the first 10 minutes of each half. That time period has been a key area of concern for Shea, who has also said that UMass must first focus on its own play.

"We can't worry about who we are playing, we have to focus on ourselves," Shea said.

Regional host Virginia compiled an 18–3 record and won the regular season Atlantic Coast Conference title. The Cavaliers fell in the ACC tournament to UNC.

they both played this season. Harvard lost 5–0 midway through their season while UMass lost 2–1 in overtime in their six game.

A year has past and both rosters have experienced extensive landscaping work, most notably for UMass the installation of seven freshmen and America East Player of the Year transfer Sophie Lecot to catapult the offense.

Harvard has acquired six freshman but has suffered the loss of Emily Stauffer, a National Player of the Year candidate in 1996, sidelined this year due to family reasons.

UMass has had more than their fair share of injuries this fall including Burrill and Robin Smith to knee injuries, Brooke Bartlett and Kurowski with nagging calf injuries, and sickness encircling senior defender Iverson, Kurowski and Burrill as well, the list goes on.

Molly McGrew and Smith are still not 100 percent, and Lecot, who just recently developed a possible case of bursitis in her knee had to miss out on practices this week and are all tentative for this weekend.

"Who knows whose going to be back from injury, we do know we are going to show up to play," coach Jim Rudy said. "The injury thing is the same, we don't know till game time."

to win a pair of Massachusetts state titles, looked comfortable at the point and running the floor.

The diminutive guard admitted after the game that he needs to adjust to passing the ball into the post as the first option rather than dishing off to the wing for spot up jumpers.

Lari Keiner, who will be receiving most of those dump down passes, scored 18 points in the win despite having to fight through double teams and zone defenses — tactics that will be employed by many coaching staffs this season.

The Marathon Basketball roster reads like a Who's Who of college players that nobody remembers.

Players from Jackson State, Chicago State and Eastern Washington litter the roster. Forward Charles Minlend, who played his college ball at St. John's, is the only player that non–rabid college hoop fans have a chance of recalling.

Minlend played for the Red Storm from 1992–'97, including missing two seasons. The 6–foot–6 swingman started all 27 games for St. John's last season and averaged 14.1 points and 7.8 assists for the 13–14 Red Storm.

He surpassed the 1000–point plateau in a 70–82 loss to Villanova at Madison Square Garden on Dec. 7.

RESCHEDULING OF FINAL EXAMS ON OFFICIAL SNOW DAYS

FALL 1997

In order to reschedule final examinations in case of snow, two alternate exam periods have been devised. They are 6:30 p.m. and 8:45 p.m. each exam day. The use of these alternative periods in the event of closings is outlined below. In addition, the academic calendar includes Monday, December 22, as an official snow day in the event that the University is closed December 20. This policy goes into effect ONLY if the University if officially closed. The snow day "hot line" is 545-3630. If the University is open, all exams are expected to take place as scheduled. Each faculty member should inform his or her class of the planned time and location of the rescheduled final exam in the event of a snow day. All rescheduled exams will be held in the same location as published in the final exam schedule.

If the University is closed until 10:30 a.m.

8:00 am	rescheduled to 6:30 pm same day
10:30 am	held as originally scheduled
1:30 pm	held as originally scheduled
4:00 pm	held as originally scheduled

During a snow emergency closing period, essential personnel who report to work may only park in the following areas:

Lot 21 (west of Southwest)
Lot 25 (west of Physical Plant and north of roadway to yellow lot only)
Lot 31 (north of Engineering and Lederle Graduate Research Center)
Lot 32 and 34 (south of Whitmore and SOM)
Lot 62 (south of Morrill Science)

SUGGESTIONS / IDEAS FOR PARKING "SMART" ON A SNOW DAY:

1. Use the UMass bus service
2. Car pool rides whenever possible
3. Walk if possible
4. Have someone drop you off
5. If space is not available in your assigned lot, go to either Lot 25 or yellow lot (both west of Physical Plant). During snow conditions, it is not possible to guarantee normal lot capacity will be available.
6. If you receive a parking ticket and believe it was improperly issued, you may appeal it at Parking Services within 21 days from the date issued. Appeals can be submitted in writing, appealed in person by the Hearing Clerk or emailed (hearing@admin.umass.edu).

Horoscopes

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You will find yourself serving others on more than one occasion today. What can you learn from a new turn of events? Are you willing to learn?

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — That which seems most unusual will prove most fascinating to you today. You must take care that you're not being deceived.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — Someone in your immediate circle may not be playing by the rules, and it will be up to you to see that any inappropriate behavior is stopped.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — Something you've dreamed of doing for quite some time may be more than possible in the near future. Today, you can begin preparing in earnest.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — Good news on the home front should enable you to approach a challenge at work with new energy and enthusiasm. Spread the word to others!

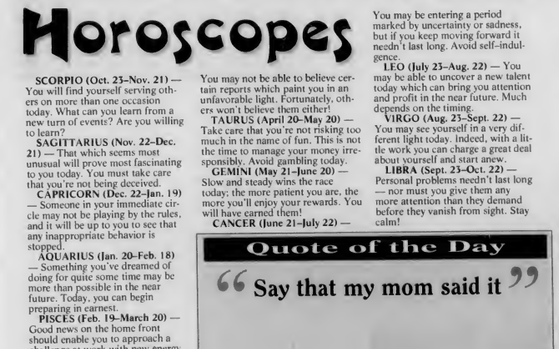
ARIES (March 21–April 19) — You may not be able to believe certain reports which paint you in an unfavorable light. Fortunately, others won't believe them either!

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — Take care that you're not risking too much in the name of fun. This is not the time to manage your money irresponsibly. Avoid gambling today.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — Slow and steady wins the race today; the more patient you are, the more you'll enjoy your rewards. You will have earned them!

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — You may be entering a period marked by uncertainty or sadness, but if you keep moving forward it needn't last long. Avoid self–indulgence.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You may be able to uncover a new talent today which can bring you attention and profit in the near future. Much depends on the timing.



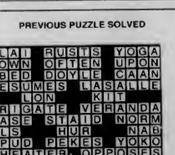
VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You may see yourself in a very different light today. Indeed, with a little work you can charge a great deal about yourself and start anew.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — Personal problems needn't last long — nor must you give them any more attention than they demand before they vanish from sight. Stay calm!

Quote of the Day

"Say that my mom said it"

–Overheard (possibly by your mom)



Having successfully completed her shopping without a major tantrum, Linda now had to run the harrowing gauntlet of toy and candy dispensers.

Boston teams regain status; fans hopeful

Optimism in sports is hard to come by — especially in Boston.

Not too long ago, the Patriots were on a plane to New Orleans to play in the Super Bowl. New England fans were in their glory. Everybody loved the Patriots.

They lost, but they were still the AFC champs with a dynamic offense and a hard–working defense. Things were looking good.

Pete Carroll came in and said all the right things. The Pats started off the season 4–0, and Carroll was The Man. A bump in the road (more like a land mine) and all of a sudden Dick MacPherson's calling in the plays to Hugh Millen all over again.

Fred Hurlbrink Jr. 2000 — Around the Horn

Rick Pitino came to Boston to take over the Celtics and people went nuts. He made a lot of trades, cut a lot of players and nobody cared because he's Rick Pitino, the genius behind a college hoop dynasty.

He let Rick Fox go and kept Pervis Ellison, but hey it's Rick Pitino.

Anyway, point is people felt good about the C's again. Pitino could suit up Rigo Nunez and Tom Menino and fans would still cough up megabucks for FleetCenter seats.

But, now that it's obvious how long Pitino's project will take, seven games into the season, fans are yelling and booing at the FleetCenter.

The Bruins are at the top of their division under new coach Pat Burns. They're playing grind-it-out, tough, good ol' Bruin hockey, and people are liking it.

Nobody's been down on the B's this season yet because they've been busy picking on the Celts and the Pats.

Nobody ever dares be optimistic about the Red Sox.

Back to the point. Fickle fans aside, what's happening in Boston is a ressurection. There's a certain glimmer of hope around the Boston sports scene whereas a couple seasons ago... well, there was UMass basketball and Bill Parcells sound bites.

Pitino has a young Kentucky... uhh, Celtics team running and gunning — yeah they misfire a lot, but they're fun to watch, and they get better every game.

The Bruins are well on their way to a playoff berth while building a foundation for years to come with players like Joe Thornton and Sergei Samsonov and Kyle MacLaren.

The Patriots are still one of the youngest teams in the league. As of now, they're in the playoffs. What's not to love about the way the Pats go at it?

Umm, the Red Sox... never mind.

Boston sports fans take for granted the history they have — a history that only a handful of cities in the world can match. Optimism wouldn't be so hard to come by if the Sox would just get a damn pitching staff.

• A proposed list of candidates to resurrect the fallen UMass football program:

UMass water polo coach Russ Yarworth led his team to four straight Eastern titles and two consecutive final fours. He has never won less than 57 percent of his games in one season. He continually recruits top talent despite battling with the Californian dominance of the sport. His rapport with his players is unmatched. Now, if you could play football in a pool..

I heard George Seifert is going to take over in Dallas next season, so Barry Switzer will be looking for a job. Switzer is a guy who can handle controversy and scrutinizing media. So, if some guy writes a fire–the–coach column, Switzer would be cool with that.

Kenny, from South Park. Now, there's a guy that knows how to handle adversity. He'd be a great coach. He dies in every episode, but somehow he finds the strength to pick up the pieces (pun intended) and press on. He'd have a top-notch coaching staff, I mean Kyle and Stan and Cartman — beat that.

How about the Minuteman? He's at every game anyway. The fans could never get mad at him, and I bet he gives a great interview.

Since Hertz isn't in any hurry to hire him back, O.J. Simpson will be looking for work. You know, he's a perfect fit — a legendary running back at a traditional running back college. Marcel Shipp would love it. Besides, cost of living has got to be cheaper in Amherst than in California. And nobody would give him any flack.

UMass looks for "Miracle at McGuirk, II"

Coach Hodges on hot seat as dismal 1997 season comes to close

By Luke Meredith
Collegian Staff

Last season's Connecticut–Massachusetts football game has become known as "The Miracle at McGuirk" after UMass scored 20 points in the last eight minutes to beat the Huskies 39-38. The win gave the Minutemen a winning season (6–5), and helped to erase the memories of some very tough losses down the stretch.

But no matter what happens when UMass (2–8, 1–6 A–10) hosts UConn at 12:30 p.m. this Saturday at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium, it's going to be hard to erase the losses this season. The 1997 season has turned into a nightmare the past three weeks, and if the Minutemen can't pull out a win over the Huskies, UMass will end the 1997 season 2–9, the first team in school history to lose nine games.

Saturday, 12:30 p.m.

The tailspin has left many wondering about the status of Hodges. He said at the beginning of the season that he needed to get the Minutemen out of a so–called "6–5" rut, after 5–6, 6–5 and 6–5 records the past three seasons. But 2–8 wasn't what he had in mind. And with his contract up after the season, questions have been swirling about what direction UMass athletic director Bob Marcum will take concerning Hodges, who is 34–30 in six seasons at the helm.

"It's been a very disappointing season, and this is not a situation any of us want to be in. But it is the reality," Hodges said. "We'll sit down with Mr. Marcum very shortly and discuss the future of UMass football, just like we do at the end of every season."

There is still a game to be played on Saturday, and UMass will be facing a much better team than the one they beat in 1996. UConn — who unlike Massachusetts will finish their season next week — is 6–3 (3–3 Atlantic 10). The game, which at one time was to be "The Bermuda Bowl," was rescheduled for McGuirk Stadium when plans to play the game in that tropical locale fell through.

The UConn offense is currently ranked fourth in Division I–AA, at a clip of 36.8 points per game. The Huskies have a balanced attack, led

Minutewomen at NCAA Championships

UMass attempts to fulfill Johnston's prophecy

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

Sitting in a classroom in Boyden Building, soaking wet, excited and exhausted after winning the Atlantic 10 tournament, Massachusetts field hockey player Erica Johnston waited for the interviews to begin.

The question came: "What are your thoughts on the NCAA tournament?"

Johnston's answer didn't surprise anyone who knew her. The brash confidence shined through as she said, "Two more games and then the final four."

Unfortunately for the junior forward, Massachusetts coach Patty Shea arrived at the classroom doorway in time to hear her player's remark. Shea shook her head and smiled.

If the Minutewomen are to make Johnston's prophecy a reality, they must start with Penn State, the first–round opponent they will face tomorrow at noon. The game will be at the site of the tourney's No. 3 seed, Virginia.

The NCAA only seeds the top four teams in the tournament. All host first and second round action and all have opening round byes. Two–time defending champ North Carolina received the No. 1 seed, while Old Dominion picked up the second seed and Maryland wrapped up the No. 4.

Field Hockey
Massachusetts vs. Penn State @ Virginia

UMass last faced Penn State in a neutral field contest at the University of Connecticut. The Minutewomen emerged victorious from the overtime contest, 4–3. The majority of the strength that the Nittany Lions showed, however, is still present in State College.

Of the three players who found the back of the UMass net, two remain on the Nittany Lion roster. In addition, Penn State's goalie, Jamie Smith is back in goal for Penn State.

However, the power that fueled the Minutewoman victory has not yet left Amherst. Johnston scored the sudden death game–winner and a second–half goal, and midfielder Kate Putnam tallied to send the game to overtime.

Unlike, Penn State, though, UMass will send a new

The unknown.

There's no fear, but not much knowledge floating about either, with both teams suffering from problematic injuries that have forced both to vary their lineups and inevitably, their game style.

The history.

Last week at the Atlantic 10 tournament the Massachusetts women's soccer team (17–4–1, 11–0 A–10) was hoping to overturn last year's decisive loss in the final. This weekend, the Minutewomen are focusing on repeating last year's first round NCAA success over Harvard University, in which they won 2–1 in a thrilling triple overtime on Erica Iverson's goal in the 132nd minute.

The No. 17 Crimson — three–time defending Ivy League champion — earned an automatic bid and are playing host on Sunday at 1 p.m. at Ohiri Field to the No. 20 Minutewomen in the first round of the NCAA tournament.

This is the third time in four years these two teams have faced each other. The other was in 1994, when UMass defeated Harvard 3–0 at home.

Harvard (11–3–2, 6–1 Ivy), a low–scoring squad, has outscored their opponents only 28–16. The Crimson is led by junior forward Naomi Miller, with six goals and 11 assists for 23 points. Junior forward Decon Bingham follows with 13 points, Linsday Minkus has 11 points and Ashley Berman rounds out their only players in double–digit scoring with three goals and four assists for 10 points.

"They are a deceptive team in scouting reports," UMass coach Jim Rudy said. "They don't have any superstars but they have a lot of good players."

For the first time in Massachusetts history, three players accumulated more than 50 points a piece. All A–10 second team selection Kara Green tallied 12 goals and 14 assists, for 38 points followed by A–10 All–Conference selections Emma Kurowski with 13 goals and nine assists for 35 points, and Sophie Lecot completing the triumvirate with 12 goals and seven assists for 31 points.

The defense has been solid all year for UMass as well, with Iverson and goaltender Danielle Dion both receiving A– 10 All–Conference honors, alongside sweeper Amanda Thompson and senior Liz Rutherford with Amy Burrill rounding out the last line of offense. And that is exactly why UMass has been able to be so versatile with positions with players like Burrill (seven points), and Iverson being able to step it up on the offensive side and become the fourth leading scorer on the team with 16 points.

"If our people take advantage of our opportunities and we don't miss any layups like we have been lately," Rudy said. "Then we should do okay."

Possibly the only way to gauge both teams is their matches versus nationally ranked Connecticut, whom

GEO not giving up on contract negotiations

By Julie Siegal
Collegian Staff

Despite snowy weather conditions on Friday, hundreds of students and teaching assistants collectively participated in the Graduate Employee Organization's (GEO) teach–in and rally, in which graduate student employees warned the University of Massachusetts administration that giving up on contract negotiations is the last thing on their minds.

"We have to let [Associate Chancellor] Sue Pearson know we're serious about the negotiation process," said GEO vice–president Jennifer Fasulo at Friday's rally inside the Student Union. "We're tired. Twenty months is too long."

GEO has been bargaining with the administration for a new contract for over 20 months and not until Fri.day Nov. 7 have both sides begun to reach some agreement, according to Pearson.

The main issues GEO wants in a new contract — fair wages, child care, affirmative action and health care, are reasonable and realistic proposals GEO members said.

Graduate student employees at UMass currently earn on average between $6,000–$7,000 a year, approximately half of teaching assistants' earnings at the University of Con necticut.

The teach–in was not a strike, however, according to GEO members, but a "symbolic protest of the lack of respect and fair treatment we receive as grad workers on this campus."

TA perspectives on the teach–in Over 200 sections, or approximately 4,000 students took part in Thursday and Friday's teach–in at the Campus Center and Student Union.

The Student Union Ballroom, Cape Cod Lounge and Cape Cod Annex were three of the largest spaces reserved for the teach–in, with up to four classes occupying each space at once. Some Registered Student Organizations (RSOs), however, also loaned out their offices for the day.

The Teaching Assistants (TAs) who participated said they felt the teach–in was a good way to show the administration the grad employees are sticking together until a new con tract is written.

Chris Erickson, a political science 373 "Contemporary Political Theory" TA, said he brought his classes to the Student Union Ballroom because the coursework he was teaching on political space complemented the issues of the teach–in.

"This fits in beautifully with the coursework," Erickson said. "It's also a good forum to express the frustration as TAs and it shows we're working together as a team."

Erickson said he is upset with the lengthy contract negoti ations and said the undergraduate students will be affected the most.

"Some of us have to work two jobs so there's less time to prepare for class," Erickson said. "Unless we're willing to make a huge sacrifice elsewhere, students are the ones that have to pay."

TA Heidi Marshall, who taught her German 110 class in the Cape Cod Lounge, said her students are just as con– cerned about GEO acquiring a contract as are GEO mem bers themselves.

"The kids seem to think it's a good idea, especially when it depends on getting better, more qualified TAs who don't get offers from other places," Marshall said.

Luis Saenz de Viguera, a Spanish 230 TA, said he gave his students a choice on whether or not to attend class in the Student Union Ballroom. Five students out of the normal class size of 15 attended Friday's class.

"We as TAs had a choice," Saenz de Viguera said. "We're not depriving our students of their right to be taught, but at the same time we're making our point."

Student perspectives on the teach–in Undergraduates respond to rally

By Sarah J. Kimmel

The Graduate Employee Organization's (GEO) fight to settle a new contract has expanded outside the classroom. Last week's teach–in and rally brought over two hundred discussion groups and classes taught by Teaching Assistants (TAs) into the Campus Center and Student Union.

The question being asked is not only how the teach–in will help the graduate students, but how it affects University of Massachusetts undergraduates who depend on the TAs to teach them.

"I see a TA as a student teacher," said freshman Jessica Fink. "They are getting hands–on training for their future. If they are getting paid that's great, but I think dental care and everything, that's ridiculous. They're still students and under the University."

Fink's Theater 100 discussion group met in their regular classroom as scheduled. Several TAs opted for their regular settings, rather than Student Union locations, because of exams.

Many students said that the TA's decision to conduct class rather than go on strike shows their consideration for their students and their passion for their jobs.

Senior Yen Naman said, "I think that this teach–in shows

Kidnapped American released in Columbia

BOGOTA, Colombia (AP) — An American geologist kidnapped eight months ago by leftist rebels at a remote gold mine has been released after a relatively small ransom was paid, authorities said yesterday.

Frank Skee, 44, and a Colombian colleague, Hermes Torres, were freed Saturday in the southern state of Narino, near the border with Ecuador, by the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, U.S. and Colombian officials said.

Skee said in a telephone interview that neither was mistreated, that both were in good health and that they smoked cigarettes and played chess with their rebel guards to fight boredom.

Initial ransom demands topped $1 million, but in the end less than $50,000 was paid after negotiators persuaded the rebels that Skee's employer had very little money, said the sources, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Many companies with operations in rebel strongholds make such payments to the guerrillas in return for being left alone. Those that don't tend to have employees kidnapped.

Netanyahu to discuss peace talks in U.S. visit

INDIANAPOLIS (AP) — Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu arrived here yesterday at the start of a three-day U.S. visit facing questions about a long-simmering dispute over Jewish identity and stalled peace talks with the Palestinians.

Netanyahu was to address both issues in a speech last night to almost 4,000 leaders of U.S. and Canadian Jews at the Council of Jewish Federations' annual General Assembly. Many are concerned with a proposed law that would formalize the monopoly of Orthodox religious authorities over conversions to Judaism in Israel. Earlier, Netanyahu canceled a scheduled news conference and did not answer reporters' questions during a meeting with Indianapolis Mayor Stephen Goldsmith.

"He's got a speech to prepare before an important Jewish gathering and he asked for a timeout," said an Israeli government spokesman, speaking on condition of anonymity.

Since its founding 49 years ago, Israel has counted on cash from Jews in the United States and elsewhere to help pay for economic development, social services and military operations.

The proposed Israeli law on conversions marks the climax of a long-standing dispute between the Orthodox stream of Judaism, which adheres to a rigid interpretation of Jewish law, and the more liberal Conservative and Reform movements, which want to adjust Judaism to modern life.

Tim O'Brien speaks tonight at Student Union Ballroom

By Jonathan Liberty
Collegian Staff

Renowned author Tim O'Brien will present a lecture entitled, "The Writer's Life," in the Student Union Ballroom tonight at 8 p.m. The lecture, which is sponsored by the Distinguished Visitors Program (DVP), is free and open to the public.

O'Brien, who is an award–winning author and former national affairs reporter for the Washington Post, was selected to speak in accordance with DVP's purpose to "keep the University of Massachusetts community sensitive to world affairs and happenings."

O'Brien received the National Book Award for fiction in 1979 for Going After Cacciato, while the title story from the novel The Things They Carried won a National Magazine Award.

Published in 1990, The Things They Carried was chosen by the editors of The New York Times Book Review as one of the best books of the year.

Both Time magazine and The New York Times Book Review celebrated O'Brien's most recent novel, In the Lake of The Woods, as one of the best works of fiction in 1994. Currently, O'Brien is working on a novel.

A native of Worthington, Minn., O'Brien graduated from Macalister college in St. Louis. He then served as a foot soldier in Vietnam from 1969 to 1970. Upon returning to the United States, O'Brien pursued graduate studies at Harvard University.

As a Registered Student Organization (RSO), DVP is financed by the Student Activities Trust Fund (SATF) which is funded by the undergraduate students at UMass.

According to a DVP statement, they invite "individuals whose experience in politics, science, humanities, media, or arts qualify them to interpret and raise questions about life in all its dimensions."

In the past, DVP has sponsored lectures by Ralph Nader, Allen Ginsberg, bell hooks, Angela Davis, Kurt Vonnegut, and many others.

Iraq braces for possible attack as U.S. continues military buildup

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) — iraq ordered Baghdad hospitals to evacuate non–emergency patients yesterday in preparation for a possible U.S. air attack over Saddam Hussein's refusal to comply with U.N. weapons inspections.

Thousands of Iraqi civilians, meanwhile, flocked to Saddam's palaces in Baghdad and industrial installations around the capital to join other people serving as human shields.

The United States yesterday pressed forward with its military buildup, sending the aircraft carrier USS George Washington through the Suez Canal toward the Persian Gulf.

Kuwait and Syria, which supported strikes against Iraq during the 1991 Persian Gulf War, said they were opposed to the use of force in the current standoff, which began on Oct. 29 when Iraq decided to expel American weapons inspectors working for the United Nations.

"We do not support any military action against Iraq," said Kuwait's foreign minister, Sabah al-Ahmed al-Sabah.

Kuwait usually is unsparing in its criticism of Iraq, which invaded the emirate in 1990, triggering the Gulf War.

At the end of the 1991 war, the United Nations ordered Iraq to destroy its weapons of mass destruction and sent in a multinational team of inspectors to monitor Iraqi compliance.

Last month, Iraq asserted that the American inspectors were spies intent on prolonging U.N. economic sanctions imposed after the Kuwait invasion. Though the Security Council warned of consequences if Iraq expelled the monitors, Iraq went ahead with the move Thursday, deepening fears of a military strike.

Richard Butler, the chief U.N. weapons inspector, warned in an interview with CNN that Iraq could resume building biological weapons within a week.

In Baghdad, fuel rationing forced U.N. monitors overseeing an oil-for-food program to halt their work yesterday. The monitors, who were unable to drive to work, said they expect to send teams out today after they secure fuel supplies.

The tightly monitored program allows Iraq to sell $2 billion in oil for six months in exchange for food and other humanitarian goods.

Iraq, fearing the United States might target oil refineries and storage tanks in the event of a military strike, announced Saturday it was introduc-

Town parking garage options debated

By Paul Hayes
Collegian Staff

AMHERST —— It's bigger, but it's also better.

This was the message supporters of the larger Meyer and Meyer parking garage plan attempted to drive home with Amherst Town Meeting representatives as the parking garage debate continued last Thursday night.

Currently two garage plans, one designed by the Meyer and Meyer architectural firm slated to cost $4.8 million and contain 292 spaces, the other by Peter Kitchell planned to cost $4 million and consist of 215 spaces, are vying for town meeting acceptance.

Elisa Campbell, speaking on behalf of the Meyer plan (a.k.a. Boltwood Place), said the plan hides cars in the building, and enhances the existing pedestrian area of the Boltwood Walk site where the garages are slated to be built.

"Cars are where cars belong, people are where they want to be — with other people." Campbell said.

Campbell said the Boltwood site should be a people place, and not a road or a driveway as it would be if the Kitchell were approved.

The Meyer garage would provide an edge which will compliment the buildings on North Pleasant street, and would frame spots for people to relax in, Campbell said.

"Create the edge, and people will come." Vice Chair of the Parking Garage Committeee David Williams said.

Proponents for the Kitchell plan say that the Meyer plan is not aesthetically pleasing, and does not compliement surrounding buildings.

Yet Campbell said beauty need not be sacrificed for an increased number of spaces.

The building will be built with finishes matching surrounding buildings, and not a stand alone structure said Williams.

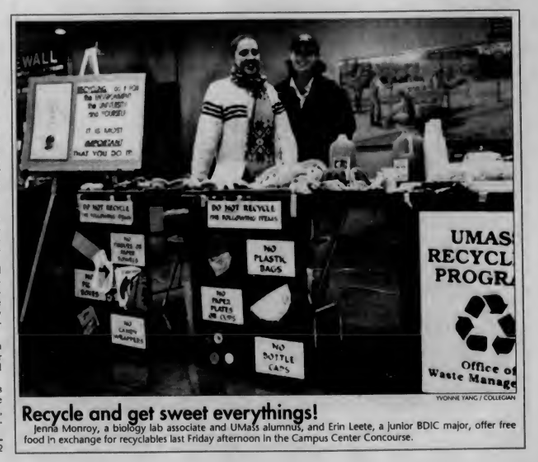
"I think a parking lot can be equally as ugly as a garage," Campbell said. "But there's no reason why a parking garage can not be an attractive building."

The area that presently exists is an eyesore, you can only improve it, Zanna co–owner Adam Lussier said.

Many downtown businesses support the Meyer plan.

"I am absolutely, unequivocally in favor of the Meyer Plan." Lussier said. "We have a parking defecit downtown, and we need to create a defined area where people are guaranteed a parking space."

Black Sheep owner Nick Seamon said that when he moved to Amherst in 1975, there were no malls and Amherst was where people shopped.



There used to be two hardware stores, a grocery store, and shoe stores in Amherst center; but these stores were put out of business by the growth of bigger and more accessible stores built on Route 9 in Hadley, Seamon said.

"The malls sucked all the life out of Amherst, and the Town Meeting did nothing about it," Seamon said. "They're guilty as charged."

Seamon said that Amherst is a one–dimensional town, but a parking garage would be a step towards remedying the situation.

"You can't get a stereo, a guy can't get a good pair of shoes in Amherst anymore," Seamon said. "Don't students need car stereo's? Jeans?"

The graduate students are asking for a higher salary, dental care and child care, amongst other things. Kirsten Walser is a junior and a former employee of the Grassroots Day Care, which is for children of UMass employees and some students.

"There is very little child care here for both graduate and undergraduate students. There are very few slots available for these children. I don't see how, without childcare provided, these students can afford rent, food, tuition as well as care for their children," Walser said.

"I definitely think they deserve more benefits such as child care," said post-graduate student Lori Gilmore. "They do a lot of work and are underpaid."

The TA's low income is of concern to their students. There is a fear that the TAs will be forced to get second or third jobs to pay for living expenses and will not be able to focus on their teaching duties.

ing gasoline rationing.

The government yesterday ordered non-emergency patients to be removed from hospitals in Baghdad. It was not clear how many people would be evacuated.

Hassan Abdel Jabar, a doctor at Baghdad Central Hospital, said the hospital would only accept emergency cases "because we are expecting a strike by the Americans."

The United States and Britain, meanwhile, worked to rally support for strong action against Saddam.

"He is not a man that is going to listen to any language of reason or sweetness unless the person using it is also carrying a big stick," British Prime Minister Tony Blair said in a BBC television interview.

Secretary of State Madeleine Albright cut short a visit to Qatar and left for neighboring Bahrain, Kuwait and Saudi Arabia to discuss the standoff.

In Qatar, Albright lashed out at Baghdad for refusing to comply with U.N. resolutions demanding the elimination of its weapons of mass destruction.

"Unfortunately for the Iraqi people, instead of meeting these requirements, for six years, Saddam Hussein has lied, delayed, obstructed and tried to deceive," she said.

In Iraq, Foreign Minister Mohammed Saeed al-Sahhaf called for a peaceful solution to the crisis.

"The use of military force has proven that it does not lead to solutions, but to a complication of matters," he said in remarks broadcast on Iraq television and carried by Egypt's Middle East News Agency.

Intent on rallying support for Iraq, Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz planned to begin a tour of North African countries with a trip to Morocco yesterday. Most Arab states oppose military action against Iraq.

"All Arab countries are in solidarity with Iraq," Syrian Defense Minister Mustafa Tlass told al-Hayat, a London-based newspaper.

Exiles finance deadly attack at Cuban hotel

MIAMI (AP) — Cuban exiles in Miami raised $15,000 to pay a small group of criminals from El Salvador to set off bombs in tourist hotels in Cuba, according to a published report yesterday.

The bombings, which killed an Italian tourist, were the work of a ring of Salvadoran car thieves and armed robbers who met during military training, the Miami Herald reported, citing anonymous sources in the local exile community.

Money to finance the bombings was raised by Luis Posada Carriles, a veteran of the exiles' secret war against Cuban President Fidel Castro, the paper said.

Posada was charged and acquitted of a terrorist bombing in 1976 that killed 73 people on a Cuban jetliner. He spent nine years in a Venezuelan jail, but escaped in 1985 and settled in El Salvador under a false name.

Posada reportedly approached Miami exiles in mid-1996, using his renown as an anti-Castro warrior to solicit wealthy Cuban-Americans for money.

"He contacted Miami and said he had reliable Salvadorans, young men from the military academy, ready to go into Cuba and set off small explosives in tourist hotels," one Miami exile, who wasn't named, told the newspaper.

Cuban police have said a Salvadoran confessed that he was offered $4,500 per bombing and charged that the money came from the Cuban American National Foundation, an anti-Castro lobby based in Miami. The foundation denied any involvement in the bombings.

"Some of the money came from big names, but not the well-known (anti-Castro) organizations," said another unidentified exile. "In fact, some little guy, a small businessman, who apparently just closed a big deal, handed over an envelope with several thousand in cash."

Exile sources also said the deal with the Salvadorans was for no more than $5,000 per mission.

The Herald's exile sources declined to identify the donors, saying the cash probably violated U.S. neutrality laws that prohibit plotting armed operations against other nations.

Eleven bombings targeting Cuban tourist hotels and a restaurant, from April 12 to Sept. 4 wounded six people in addition to the tourist who was killed.

The Herald interviewed a dozen Salvadoran sources and said its findings largely supported the Cuban police version of the bombings — that they were carried out by the Salvadorans, not internal anti-Casto dissidents.

Police in Cuba arrested one Salvadoran in the bombings. Raul Cruz Leon remains in custody there, charged with six of the bombings. He appeared on Cuban state television Sept. 15 and said he acted completely alone on his bombing mission.

they are disgusted by how long GEOs contract negotiations are taking.

Senior history and anthropology major Andrea Murphy said it is good for all students to show their support, regard less of their undergraduate or graduate status.

"It's important to stand together," Murphy said. "This is ridiculous. The administration should be ashamed it's taking so long."

Junior STPEC major Liz Karney said most of her classes are taught by TAs and if TAs are teaching most classes, she should be paying less to attend the University.

"I should be paying less," Karney said. "And if I'm going to pay the same amount, then TAs should be getting paid more [for doing a professor's work]."

Sophomore biology major Adam Lajeunesse, who is in favor of GEO, simply said "the school just hates spending money."

Not all undergraduates, however, believe the teach-in was beneficial to their needs.

A student who declined to give his name out of fear that his statement would be held against him by his TAs said he was forced to attend class in the Student Union because a quiz was given in one of his classes.

"The TAs are using grades as a force to bring us here," he said. "It's an unethical move on the part of GEO. I'd rather see them go on strike."

He said no person should be forced to attend the teach-in, but some TAs are using tactics like quizzes and attendance to compel their students to attend.

"We're being treated like slaves," he said. "They're using us as a human shield to keep them from going on strike."

Other students said the teach-in wouldn't accomplish anything and it may even be harmful to undergraduates.

"The teach-in isn't going to do anything," said Steven Janvrin, senior English major. "The only thing that's going to come out of it is all these kids [in the Cape Cod Lounge] won't learn what they normally would in a classroom."

He said filling a lounge with three to four classes is dis tracting to not only the students in the classes, but other students who normally utilize spaces like the Cape Cod Lounge as a study area.

"It's a distraction, I can't concentrate," Janvrin said. "I can barely read the paper."

The rally and march to Whitmore

At noon on Friday, GEO held a rally inside the Student Union, in which members promised a fair new contract for all graduate students employees.

"Sue Pearson — we are not walking away," said GEO president Mahmood Ketabchi during the rally. "We're going to fight and fight hard to get a good deal for our members because they are hard-working people."

Ketabchi warned the administration GEO is taking their contract negotiations seriously and they will not walk away until a settlement is drawn.

Eighty-eight percent of the Spanish and Portuguese classes are taught by TAs, so asking for higher wages is not unreal istic, said GEO vice-president Jennifer Fasulo.

"It's insulting the University feels it can pay grad employ ees such appalling salaries," Fasulo said.

The top 10 administrators at the University earn an aver age $100,000 a year, she continued.

"If you took one-third of the top 10 administrators sala ries, we could afford a child care center and they would still make more than anyone at the University," Fasulo said.

GEO requested $300,000 for a new child care center as one of their proposals for a new contract and Fasulo said she doesn't understand why the University can't fund the amount requested if the University allegedly has $20 million in surplus reserve funds.

The enrollment of diverse graduate students has been declining every year, which Fasulo said is another problem GEO wishes to mend in a new contract.

There has been a 49 percent decline in African–American graduate students, with 35 departments having no African– American graduate students at all, according to Fasulo.

In asking for a more diverse graduate student enrollment, Fasulo told the administration to "put your money where your mouth is and fund an affirmative action proposal."

Speakers, in addition to graduate employees, expressed their opinions at the rally in favor of GEO acquiring a new contract.

Tom Juravich of the MSP faculty union told the audience GEOs lack of diversity and low wages is the same thing that faculty face at the University every year.

"A great university is a place that treats its workers well," Juravich said. "That includes people who serve in the cafe teria, people who clean the streets and yes, its graduate students."

Charlotte Chandler–Coates, President of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees (ASME), local 1776 commended graduate employees on not "selling out."

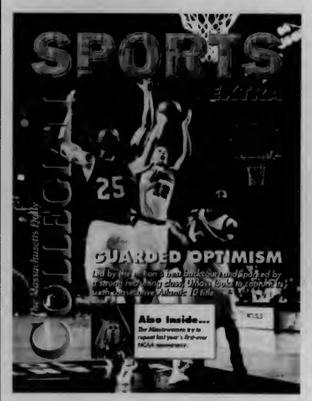
"I believe you need and deserve everything you're asking for," Chandler–Coates said.

The administration wants to settle the contract just as bad as GEO does, she continued.

"Go to the top and get the rich people to support you," Chandler–Coates said.

Tom Taaffe, co–chief negotiator for GEO, warned both graduate and undergraduate students that due to the lack of diversity among graduate students, as well as undergrads. the next generation will be more racially and socially segre gated than it is now.

In addition to there being 35 academic departments with out any African–American students, Taaffe said there are also 11 departments with no ALANA graduate students.



"Departments (on campus) are almost exclusively male," Taaffe said. "I guarantee the next generation will be white and male. Decisions from our lives will come from the chosen few, not from all of us."

At the conclusion of the rally at 12:45 p.m., approxi– mately 50–75 students marched the GEO bargaining team in the snow to Whitmore for contract negotiations at 1 p.m.

Associate Chancellor Susan Pearson could not be reached for comment about Friday's bargaining session.

UM presents religious lectures

By Sarah J. Kimmel
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts is presenting a free seminar entitled "Inter–Religious Dialogues" this week to address religious and spiritual searching among college students. This multicultural series is the beginning of a new organization, the UMass Inter–Religious Project, created by UMass history professor Will Johnston.

Johnston, a specialist on European intellectual history and the history of religion, has joined together with the assistant dean of students Merle Ryan to create this project. It is their goal through these dialogues to encourage students to learn more about the diverse avenues for spirituality available to them.

"At least three–quarters of students are looking for some sort of spirituality that they can adopt. They are being bombarded by a variety of religious and secular messages, and they don't know how to sort them out," Johnston said in a press release. "The Inter–Religious Project will not only help students clarify their own traditions, but enable them to enlarge their spiritual identity to include aspects of other traditions."

Each evening's event will be planned by a different Registered Student Organization (RSO) on campus and will consist of a panel of three to five speakers, each from a different religious tradition. Each panel will be chaired by a representative from the sponsoring RSO.

The seminar began last night with "Obstacles to and Empowerment for Religious Life at UMass" in Campus Center room 162. This panel incorporated representatives from the Baha'i, Muslim, Hindu and Christian Associations.

Monday night's panel will consist of Kimberly Quinell, a representative of the Baha'i Faith Community, Christopher Carlisle, UMass Episcopal Chaplain, Dick Tereni, Co–author of "The God Particle," and UMast microbiology professor, Albey Reiner. The group will be discussing "Science and Religion" in Herter 231.

On Tuesday the discussion will be "Connecting to the Divine: Do We Need Clergy?" There will be representatives from the Baha'i Faith Community, the Islamic Society of Western Massachusetts, Keshet at Hampshire College, the Pagan Students Association, and Valley Zendo. This will be held in the Campus Center 163C.

"Our Environment: Spiritual and Moral Choices" will be the topic of Wednesday's panel discussion in Hasbrouck 134. Guest speakers from Mount Holyoke College, Temple Emmanuel in Lowell, and Gordon College will be leading a talk about the choices a college student may need to make about their religion in a dormitory setting.

The week will come to a close with a panel made up of representatives of the Baha'i Faith Community, the Islamic Society of Western Massachusetts and Wesley United Methodist Church. This group will discuss the eternally controversial topic of "Life After Death" in the Campus Center room 163.

To those interested there will also be a follow up discussion in the Campus Center on December 3.

"There's a need among people of all backgrounds for some sort of faith. Hopefully, through our project, we can provide an avenue for that questioning," Johnston said.

Hungary votes to accept NATO invitation

By Alex Bandy
Associated Press

BUDAPEST, Hungary — Hungarian voters overwhelmingly accepted NATO's invitation to membership yesterday in a show of support the government hoped would convince current alliance members that the cost of expansion is justifiable.

With nearly 90 percent of the votes counted, election officials said 85.4 percent of ballots supported NATO membership and 14.6 percent were opposed. Nearly 50 percent of Hungary's 8 million eligible voters participated, they said.

Hungarian President Arpad Goencz thanked voters. "Membership in NATO will exclude the possibility of a great war," he said over state-run television.

Foreign Minister Laszlo Kovacs said in an interview he had "never reckoned" there would be such a high share of "yes" votes.

The 16 current members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization extended invitations this summer to Hungary and two other former Soviet-bloc nations: the Czech Republic and Poland. Hungary was the only one to put the matter to a popular vote.

First, however, Hungarian leaders had to fight voter apathy, which has plagued the country since reform communists led Hungary to free elections in 1990.

In recent weeks, the Socialist government campaigned intensely to stir interest, seeking to ensure that at least 25 percent of the electorate turned out — a requirement for the results to be binding.

The country was blanketed with placards proclaiming "Fateful Decision — Nov. 16" and "Yes to NATO." Budapest was decked out as if for festivities, with red, yellow and blue city flags hung on all main streets.

Prime Minister Gyula Horn termed yesterday's vote a "fateful moment" for Hungary.

Voters faced a simple question: "Do you agree that the Republic of Hungary should guarantee its security by joining NATO?" Older Hungarians have vivid memories of 1956, when Soviet tanks crushed the Warsaw Pact's bloodiest revolt against communist rule. "I just joined NATO," one elderly voter, business executive Judit Kozma, said, "I voted 'Yes' because of our history." Younger people also want the country to be firmly part of the West, seeing NATO membership as a stepping stone to the trade and prosperity of the European Union.

Incentives for endorsing NATO were therefore strong. But the government hoped a high turnout and powerful vote for the alliance would help press the case for expansion with reluctant NATO member governments, where many lawmakers worry that growth will be expensive.

Those businesses which will be most affected by the construction of a parking garage are those located at Boltwood Walk.

Walker Lee, owner of Walker's Grill which faces out onto Boltwood Walk, said he'd be happy to deal with any inconvenience construction may create for his business.

"Anything they did in that area would improve business in the long run," Lee said.

Construction would also impede food and beverage delivery to Boltwood area businesses, but Lee said he is not concerned about it.

"Delivery people will want to bring us stuff still," Lee said. "It will be their problem, not ours."

A plus of the Meyer plan is that it would force delivery trucks, which impede traffic at Boltwood Walk, out onto planned delivery zones on North Pleasant and Main streets, Williams said.

"The trucks can be put on the streets where the urgency to hurry up is," Williams said. "Now they want to sit at Boltwood Walk all day."

The Meyer plan also contains an enclosed trash storage area.

"There will be no more dropping mattresses in the dumpster," Williams said. "We've seperated the trash, cars and people from one another."

Snow removal from the upper deck of the Meyer garage will be done by removing an upper rail and having a pick– up truck with a plow push the snow into a dumptruck at ground level.

The Meyer plan would allow pedestrians to go totally under cover to Main and North Pleasant Streets, and has been backed by the Disability Access Advisory Committee (DAAC).

Reasons the DAAC gave include the Meyer plans discouraging motorists from using Boltwood Walk as a thruway, and that covered walkways would protect the handicapped.

Isaac Ben Ezra, in his minority report from the DAAC, said that while the Meyer plan suits disabled citizens needs better now, both garage plans need to make improvements in their disability access, and both plans could be made suitable to the needs of the disabled in the next stage of planning.

"Placing a barrier in the road could eliminate Boltwood as a thruway," Ben Ezra said. "We don't need a $4.8 million garage."

In regards to payment for the Meyer Plan, Select Board member Bryan Harvey said that a $3 million state grant and $1.8 million in Amherst parking revenues would cover the cost, adding that there would be no drain on town property taxes.

Each garage plan has used differing values in determining their cost, which is akin to comparing apples and oranges, Harvey said.

Currently the Kitchell cost estimate is $4 million and the Meyer cost estimate is $4.8 million.

"But if you compare apples and apples," Harvey said, "only a $427,000 difference between the two plans is estimated on a level playing field."

Harvey said to the audience that if they thought the town might need extra parking at any time in the future, then the time to add that parking is now because it would be cheaper to build more spaces as part of the Meyer plan.

"[The Meyer Plan] is a bigger facility, but the cost is not much bigger," Harvey said.

The Amherst Finance Committee said that the price differential between the Meyer and Kitchell plans is less than estimates suggest because the Meyer plan puts money aside for land acquisition, while the Kitchell plan does not.

The Amherst Redevelopment Authority (ARA), which owns land vital to the construction of a garage at Boltwood Walk, said it would be more likely to hand the land over to the town if it accepted the Meyer plan, indicating that if the Kitchell plan were accepted the price for the land could be higher.

Yet the Finance Committee's minority report stated that a garage would lower the occupancy rates of meters all over town, and would increase traffic, noise and pollution downtown caused by an estimated 300 car per hour turnover rate.

The minority report continued that a garage will not solve the town's parking problem because the parking system is broken, due to broken meters, sporadic meter enforcement and few parking spaces.

Chinese prisoner released for medical aid

By John Leicester
Associated Press

BEIJING — Ailing but unrepentant, China's most prominent pro-democracy campaigner was released from prison and left yesterday for medical treatment in the United States.

Wei Jingsheng, who has spent all but about six months of the past 18 years in prison, left aboard a flight to Detroit, his sister and brother told the Associated Press. They said he hopes to return to China but didn't know when he would be able to.

The 47-year-old Wei, who suffers from heart problems, high blood pressure and other ailments made worse in prison, was released on medical parole, said Wei Ling and Wei Xiaotao. They said he had been unable to get adequate treatment in prison for worsening medical problems.

The dissident had said previously that he didn't want to leave China. But his poor health and harsh prison conditions compelled him to leave, his siblings said. But they also said he remained committed to his belief in democracy.

"He is firm and unshakable. No situation would make him give up his pursuit and ideals," Wei Ling said. "He thinks the sacrifices he has made for a just cause are worthwhile."

Wei's release came less than two weeks after Chinese President Jiang Zemin returned from a state visit to the United States. Chinese officials had denied suggestions they would release Wei or other dissidents as a goodwill gesture, describing the prisoners as common criminals.

But Chinese leaders are also sometimes happy to see dissidents go into exile because they frequently sink into obscurity. None, however, has ever been as high-profile as Wei, who has been mentioned for years as a leading contender for the Nobel Peace Prize.

Wei was not informed of his release until late Saturday, his sister said. Wei was allowed to spend about five hours with his family yesterday morning in a guesthouse near Beijing's airport before boarding the plane, Wei's brother and sister said. It was the first flight Wei had ever taken in his life.

For Wei's father, the family reunion was "joy tempered with sorrow because his son had been imprisoned for 18 years," Wei's sister said. "It's given our family lots of suffering, both mental and otherwise."

Since last year, Wei had been placed under 24-hour watch in a cell with two glass walls and a light that was never switched off, his sister said. He was imprisoned on a salt farm east of Beijing. Human rights groups appealed to Clinton before Jiang's trip in late October to demand the release of Wei and other dissidents. Wei was first arrested in March 1979 in the crackdown on the Democracy Wall pro-democracy movement.

Helicopters rented to aid flood victims

By Haroun Hassan
Associated Press

MOGADISHU, Somalia — Aid agencies trying to reach hundreds of thousands of people marooned by massive and deadly flooding said yesterday they have rented four helicopters to help with the task. The agencies a week ago appealed for helicopters and aluminum boats, saying they had the food, medicine and shelter materials but no means of getting the supplies to those in need. The month of flooding has cut access to many communities and washed out airstrips.

Large areas of southern Somalia between the Ethiopian border and the Indian Ocean coast are inundated, and as many as 2,000 people have died. The Somali Flood Response coordinating office estimates as many as 210,000 people have fled their homes to escape the rising water.

The helicopters, which were rented from South Africa at a cost of $1.7 million each for a month of usage, were expected to arrive within a few days, said Wendy Driscoll, a spokeswoman for CARE International in Nairobi.

"The helicopters are key to the relief efforts involving military boats, C-130 and Buffalo planes," she said.

The aid agencies fear that the Juba and Shebelle rivers, which originate in central Ethiopian highlands, may merge to create an inland sea covering eight regions and 60 square miles.

The flooding is the worst in three decades, according to the U.N. Children's Fund, which so far has identified 1,000 bodies. That number was expected to rise.

David Neff, CARE's country director for Somalia, said Saturday that any death count below 2,000 "has got to be conservative." Aid workers were having trouble getting accurate figures because they were still unable to reach vast areas, Michelle Quintaglie, a spokeswoman for the U.N. World Food Program in Nairobi, said yesterday.

The middle Shebelle river continued overflowing its banks yesterday about 55 miles north of the capital, Mogadishu, said Abdi Osman Aden, a spokesman for the relief committee of the Hawadle clan. "Seventy five percent of the people in Hiran and Middle Shebelle are now living without food and shelter," Aden said after the committee met in north Mogadishu. "There is an outbreak of malaria and diarrhea."

Aden had no estimate of the number of people normally living in the area.

A Red Cross convoy carrying blankets and plastic sheeting was expected yesterday to reach Belet Huen, about 185 miles north of Mogadishu, said Josue Anselmo, a spokesman for the International Committee of the Red Cross in Kenya.

Step down, Carlin

James Carlin's recommendations to eliminate tenure and to create a dual-track system in which professors would choose to either teach or conduct research display both his ignorance and his inadequacy to fulfill his role as chairman of the Board of Higher Education.

Carlin's recommendations are built on the false assumption that University of Massachusetts faculty are lazy free-loaders who barely work seven or eight hours a week and receive "every fringe benefit God ever invented."

Carlin clearly did not bother to research his claims. If he had, he would discover that nothing could be further from the case.

UMass Amherst faculty are a distinguished and dedicated group of scholars and educators. They have chosen to stay with an institution that over the years has been grossly undersupported by the state — because they care about their students.

Carlin does not recognize that tenure is necessary to protect the intellectual freedom of the faculty — to allow them to teach what they feel is right, even if their views differ from those currently in favor with the public.

Carlin also fails to understand the purpose and value of a research university. It is precisely that dual goal of research and teaching that defines UMass. Students come here to engage with and be taught by faculty who are doing first- rate research in their field — not to be taught by faculty who never conduct research or to share a campus with faculty conducting research that students do not learn about or participate in.

A man so openly hostile to educators and so careless about his own ignorance is clearly not fit to lead public higher education in Massachusetts. He should return to the private sector he so idealizes before he suggests any more damaging courses of action for public higher education.

Corruption at its best

The United States hit a new low this month. A case of injured workers charging their employer with various crimes is nothing new. This case, however, is clouded in controversy.

For years, the U.S. government insisted there was nothing special to the Groom Dry Lake, located within the Nellis Air Force Range in Nevada. It wasn't until a case of environmental crime was brought to Nevada's judicial system that the United States would even acknowledge the existence of a "military operating facility" at the location, which has somehow come to be called Area 51 by interested individuals. Though its existence was long denied, the photographs taken from mountain peaks just outside the Nellis Range show otherwise. It has since come into public knowledge that the U-2, SR-71 Blackbird and F-117 Stealth Fighter were all tested at the base.

Justin Smith

The charge was quite grim. Several workers claim that while working at the base, they were seriously harmed by toxic smoke produced by the burning of toxic waste in open pits the size of football fields. "These workers were told repeatedly that since this place does not exist, federal laws do not apply here," says Jonathan Turley (http://cnn.com/US/9711/06/area.51/). Turley is the law professor representing the workers. In addition to the workers, there are widows of two men who died from extreme poisoning. Despite the severity of the charges, the case was overturned on grounds of national security.

This month, an appeal to federal court was considered. In this situation, President Clinton intervened. "Under a presidential determination, which must be made annually, Clinton has decreed that evidence related to [the workers'] deaths or injuries is a top-secret matter of national security and cannot be disclosed," according to the Las Vegas Sun. Even before this event, Clinton exempted Area 51 from release of classified documents by invoking the Military State Secrets Act, which "says that the government does not have to release any evidence," according to CNN.

This type of occurrence cannot be allowed to repeat itself. What we have here is a simple case of the government breaking its own laws to protect the criminals that run our country. President Clinton is only marginally a part of the problem, since the base was built sometime during the 1950s.

This recent case is only a small part of the big problem with Area 51. For example, did you know that merely trespassing onto the base can be punishable by death? Yes, it's true. The one road leading to the base from the small town of Rachel, Nevada, has a very intimidating warning sign which reads, "Guards are authorized to use lethal force."

Let me get this straight. If I, a tax-paying U.S. citizen, were to try to do some private investigating into how my tax money is spent, I could be killed for it? Sure, this sounds like democracy to me. Furthermore, the border to the base is unmarked save for a few bits of orange tape, perhaps to avoid attracting attention. So, theoretically, it is possible to wander onto the base at night accidentally.

Oh, and about those guards... they are very well-known to the residents of Rachel for their intimidating manners. They are always dressed in camouflage, with no insignia of any type — a blatant violation. They are also very well-armed, each carrying several guns. They never engage in conversation with the locals, though they seem to glare at them as they drive past in their unmarked white Jeep Cherokees.

By now, this must sound like some sort of post- apocalyptic sci-fi thriller. I'm sure the inhabitants of the surrounding region, as well as the workers fighting their uphill court battle, wish it were science fiction.

This is supposed to be a country of the people, for the people and by the people. When did we vote to install a national security clause into law? We never did. When did we approve the building of a highly classified military base in Nevada and then choose to forbid our own entry into it? We never did. To anyone who cares about what little freedom the American public still has, or the lives lost in this travesty. I urge you to write and complain to any politician you can.

Justin Smith is a UMass student.

End police brutality now

Our officials are all talk and no action when it comes to ending police brutality.

According to the Department of Justice, 47,000 cases of police brutality were reported in the United States between 1986 and 1994. Of those, 293 were prosecuted. In my home state of New Jersey, a police officer has never been incarcerated after killing a civilian, according to the New Jersey Coalition Against Police Brutality.

But the August brutalizing of Abner Louima, a Haitian immigrant, in New York City may finally bring action.

The Congressional Black Caucus is demanding change, as is the New York–based Center for Constitutional Rights. Both groups came to Washington, D.C. in mid–September to call attention to the problem.

Rep. John Conyers announced at the Congressional Black Caucus' 27th annual conference that select members of the House Judiciary Committee will hold hearings on police brutality. Rep. Sheila Jackson–Lee and Rep. Bobby Scott are on that committee and were on hand. "We are hear to listen, but we are also here to act," Jackson–Lee told an enthusiastic crowd.

Individuals, mostly from New York and New Jersey, went before C–SPAN cameras, often filled with tears, to tell how police have harassed, threatened or assaulted them, and to tell of loved ones they have lost to policemen.

For too long, elected officials and police organizations have been turning a blind eye to these accounts.

Why, for example, does New York mayor Rudolph Giuliani feel compelled to use voice his outrage and scream for the death penalty when a police officer is killed, yet remain silent when the roles are reversed? Giuliani attacked Bronx District Attorney Robert Johnson for not seeking the death penalty after an officer chasing a suspect fell on a broken mirror and bled to death. However, when a Navy veteran was killed by a police officer, Giuliani distanced himself from the incident and barely commented on it.

Then there was the case in Elizabeth, N.J. last October, where a police officer brutally assaulted a 17–year–old boy who accidentally ran into his cruiser. The local Fraternal Order of Police attempted to wage a campaign to oust the judge who rightly convicted that officer.

We seem to be on the right track, but as we learned from the Rodney King case, it is not that simple. For true reform, we must revamp the entire criminal justice system. We must reign in vague laws that allow police officers to harass citizens and walk away scot–free. Many at the Congressional Black Caucus conference supported the idea of a community police–review board with subpoena powers to monitor the police, something that is set up in New York but was ignored by Giuliani until the Louima case forced him to respond.

We should also call to task the folks in Washington. Ron Daniels, head of the Center of Constitutional Rights, organized a demonstration outside the Justice Department building on the same day as the Congressional Black Caucus and met with Attorney General Janet Reno. According to Daniels, the attorney general's office is supposed to issue a report on police brutality each year. "We're not aware that such a report has been issued, and if it has been issued, we don't hear about it," he said.

The Congressional Black Caucus focused on a number of issues, from affirmative action to the plight of Black farmers — all very important subjects. Every other effort we make, however, comes to naught if the issue of police brutality continues to go unchecked.

Negative first impression

To the Editor:

In the Nov. 7 Collegian a letter was written by Chris Johnson of the Revolutionary Anti–Imperialist League (RAIL). To be quite frank, it was pointless and rude. The letter rambled on about how RAIL hates families, the United States, and the entire white portion of the human population of the Planet Earth. This brought me a negative first impression of Johnson and his organization.

Johnson tells us that blacks are 13 percent of the monthly drug users, yet are 74 percent of prison inmates convicted on drug charges. Perhaps he forgot that acts such as dealing and transporting such substances are also illegal. I guess such acts aren't crimes, or that is what Johnson was thinking when he stated "You can't argue blacks commit more crimes, look at drug charges."

Another of Johnson's statements I found interesting was this: "Crime has nothing to do with incarceration and the whole system is just a charade to weed out most of the whites and send the blacks and Latinos to jail." I would love to know the source of this "information." I bet I could find it in a stall in the men's room.

It is true that things are not perfect in our nation. However, when groups like RAIL start to complain about how they think everything sucks, it gets annoying. Whining solves nothing. Local comedian Dennis Leary sums up this point best when he says "Life sucks, get a helmet."

Study abroad is possible with support from parents

To the Editor:

I am writing in response to Brenda Santos' column regarding financial aid and study abroad.

I studied abroad in Egypt last year through UMass International Programs and had a very different experience from Santos. First of all, I found the International Programs staff to be very helpful before my departure. I realized, however, that my financial aid payment would not arrive until mid–October, and planned accordingly.

My parents were able to provide me with support until my financial aid check arrived, and I was able to use my credit card to make up for the rest. International Programs does provide many opportunities for study abroad and a student can use his or her financial aid while abroad, as well as apply for other scholarships.

I hope Santos' column does not make anyone hesitate to look into studying abroad. If you plan carefully and talk to people at International Programs and Financial Aid, it can all be worked out to enable you to go!

Pandora's box: Fear removed for treasures to shine

Pandora had a box of internal treasures that she kept deep within her soul. Pandora feared for many things in her life. Fear of life, death, acceptance, failure and even success; she was very insecure. Because of this, she vowed to herself that she would make sure that no one would be able to view her box of talents. Song, dance, poetry, drawing and speaking were the treasures stored in Pandora's box.

Allana E. Todmar

With all of her might, she continued to suppress her dreams and talents, because inwardly she feared how the world would perceive her. She feared to try. She feared to fall. Pandora feared so much that it began to take away from her soul. Her soul was torn within. Pandora felt there was no hope. With nowhere to turn she went to her room everyday. Pandora's face slowly became dull.

She was not stilled by her beautiful self–warmth. She did not know that it was okay to pat her own back. Never did she acknowledge the treasures that lay in her internal box. Instead, she stayed behind her own shadow, and her talents remained hidden.

Inside Pandora's room she would create her special place; her "quiet place." This space was where no one in the world would be able to watch her. The quiet place was the only place she would open up.

To create her quiet space, Pandora would take a scented candle and place it in the middle of her room. With the room dark, a fluorescent red glare from the candle would give her face a creamy brown glow. Closing her eyes and smelling the candle, she would wait for the proper moment to open her box of treasures. Feeling the spark in her eye, Pandora would then decide it was safe to open her treasures in her quiet space.

She would first start by finding music to sooth her mood. "Will it be R kelley so that I can feel sensual? Or will it be Kirk Franklin and the Family, because I have had a hard week?" she asks herself.

Choosing Kirk Franklin to listen to, Pandora starts to take in deep breaths. She then flares out her arms, making them feel very light. As if she is a dove flying, she begins to move her upper body in snake–like motions. Allowing the internal rhythms of dance to move her, she slowly allowed the treasures to release from her box.

Now moving with arms in the air and her head to guide her, Pandora started to move her waist and legs. Lifting her legs to the rhythm of the inspirational song, her calf and thigh muscles began to contract to the fast pace of the song. She counts, 1–2–3, 1–2–3. A bead of sweat trickled down the side of her head. Pandora had fully opened her box.

Swaying now, her dull face began to have a bright glow from the deep expressions that she used to explore her dance expression. Her room, which emanated the gloom that Pandora would feel, was now a safe haven for her creativity to shine. Her quiet space was one that had no boundaries.

Taking out a piece of paper, Pandora began to write her inner feelings. Not caring about proper grammar, she used "ain't," "dat," and "whateva" to say what was on her mind.

With her treasures of song and dance in her quiet space, Pandora realized that her time was up. The thought of closing her treasures in again depressed her further. Something unusual happened that day.

Pandora began to speak to herself. She also spoke to an unknown presence that she felt in the room.

"Whoever you are, I would like to say that I am very glad that you brought me onto this earth. I know I am beautiful. I know that we all have specific tasks that you want all of us in the world to fulfill. But why on earth did you give me these treasures instead of others? Why did you lavish me to be able to do all of these things? Why can't I be like everyone else? Why is my path so uncertain? I am torn within. I love my treasures, but I wish I could find a way to take them with me wherever I go."

After saying this, Pandora sat still with her eyes closed. Seeking a sign from above, she began to rock back and forth. Listening to her spirit, she realized that she always had the power to keep her box of treasures out for the world to see. The problem she had was that she did not acknowledge her own voice, song, dance, and poetry for the beauty that it had. From that day on, Pandora's box has always stayed open, and the creamy glow on her face forever replaced the dull one she used to have.

We can all learn from Pandora. Many of us respect our fear to the point where we lose a piece of our soul. For too long, money has been the motivation for success. The only true success lies where your heart is. If one fulfills their heart's purpose, every need will fall into place without effort. With heart, you will be the best that you can be because you love what you are doing. Take a heart check today and make sure that your Pandora's box of treasures isn't hidden.

Sista, Sista: I love you, empress

In the spirit of the Million Women March, I write this essay of thoughts and feelings, not as a reaction, but as a means of expression.

For the limited media coverage that was provided, I was honored and joyous by the sight of my black women as they marched in harmony and purpose in Philadelphia on Oct. 25.

Various Shades, complexions and ethnic cultures, alike, I viewed dark women.

Brown women, bronze–skinned women, copper–coated women, old and young women.

Haitians, Puerto Ricans, Cape Verdeans, Dominicans, Jamaicans, Ethiopians, South Africans, Nigerians.

It was one of the most beautiful and decorative scenes I've ever seen.

I felt strong and magnificent as black women from all over the world gathered and began a process of redemption, reconciliation, and continued the revolution.

Indeed we are living in an age where Luke, Little Kim, and Foxy Brown dominate images of the media, and thus send subliminal messages to our brothers and sisters of how Eurocentric we, as decedents of Nubians and Egyptians, have become in our 500 years existence in the Western Hemisphere.

We take refuge in demeaning, disrespect and morally devaluing our women. Taking over the reigns of disgust and outright atrocity, the epitome of oppressors, who enjoyed these practices as we were kept in shacks, bondage, and on the fields of their great "cotton, tobacco, and indigo empires."

As our women stood on auction blocks, being stripped of their clothes and womanhood, Caucasian males, mostly drunk and old, placed orders and prices, seeing who would be a sexual mistress to be raped and devalued constantly.

And they are still guilty for these acts.

I watch my sister. As she becomes the first female of my family to attend a major institution (Boston University) on a first–year scholarship. Seeing her excitement her womanhood and blackness, I see my mother and my aunts as they struggle to send their respective children to institutions of higher learning, knowing the misfortunes of being working–class parents, without spouses and understanding the plights of being Haitians, in a nondemocratic American system.

Developing into a black man is a difficult task. I may say I am one, but will I be perceived as one from my black women? Lack of respect for my mother, cursing my sister, and physically confronting my little brother, things I've been guilty of in the past, are not the necessary attributes needed to mature into a true black gentlemen.

Being a black man means supporting, embracing and loving the black woman. All of them, spiritually, and mentally. One of them, physically.

We thrive on the competitiveness of sexually mistreating them. All for props, recognition and the sake of providing them with an illness that far reaches any diagnosed cancer.

Kenny Lacoste

We are placing you, my queen, in a position to bear bastard children, become a housewife and occupy two jobs to maintain a healthy home and environment, so that your sons may not end up like "their father," and your daughters will become the spouses of "a good black man." Believe me when I say it, I've been there.

We have become susceptible to Victorian thought, and Utopian practices, as I watch you stroll in spring and summer with daisy dukes, and small tops that reveal what we should keep sacred. We long for Luke's Peep Show and Freaknik, so we may be enticed by what society deems as acceptable beauty.

Sista, Sista: I love you empress.

From the times where our dynasties ruled Africa, and beyond. I painted portraits of you on walls of great pyramids, and on leaves of papyrus. I saw you from afar, when my captives concealed my manhood in chains and cuffs, and you stood there with our children and great burdens on your back, burdens I continue to place by not treating you as the bearer of life.

You are the true womb of my nation.

And it is true that, just as a woman is responsible for bringing us in the world, they sure as hell can take us out. I realize this now. I may say that I will atone for all I have done to you and get behind your back, but the point is that it has transpired. So, it is truly in your hands to forgive me, a black man lost.

This is a rendition of how a true male of the African diaspora feels about his Sista.

I listen in the winds, of how my brothers talk about you as sexual objects, and how you, my sista, view us as objects and the derogatory terms that flow from each of lips.

Though these words (bitch, nigga, ho, dog, tramp, hoochie, piece of ass) are explicit in an article such as this, they are evident. We use them in our everyday vocabulary.

They are part of our "Ebonics."

There is a large gap between us. There has to be. For we even date and marry outside of our race, diaspora and ethnic cultures.

So, may we address the problem?

I take full responsibility for my actions, and so should all of us, both male and female. We are a collective mind, spirit, and body.

Everything I do indirectly reflects and influences you. And everything that you do indirectly reflects and influences me.

Why should we disrespect, insult and demean each other?

I have a young nephew who was brought into the world about 4 years ago. He resembles basically each male in my family, from his father (my cousin), all the way to my brother. I try to make an attempt to be around for him, at the convenience of my cousin's schedule, and try to spend quality time like any uncle, or family member would do for a young child. I might joke with him, when a beautiful Sista approaches him and calls him cute, and tries to pick him up.

Comments like asking Rivard Jr., his name, to ask them for their number, and to the movies may pop out of my mouth.

For all the harmless fun that may imply, I still promote the disrespect of you. And this may psychologically intertwine with his (noughts; and looking up to me, he may deem this as acceptable behavior.

We will not change the tides as we continually womanize, and degrade our mothers, aunts, sisters, and daughters as slave masters and politicians have done, for the past 500 years, and to this day in the year of 1997.

You, my empress, have always marched in millions for the enhancement of African–kind. But, we truly felt your force in Philadelphia.

I wrote my sister, at Boston University, a letter a couple of weeks ago, outlining how I felt about her reaching the pinnacle of college, and preparing herself for a professional career, as a professional woman.

"You are now the bearer of the torch for our family; As the first woman to graduate from private school, and attend a prestigious college, you have successfully made your rite of passage as a strong Haitian, black woman."

You will encounter many obstacles, and deviation. Do not let these temporary factors hold you down. For you will arise, and I will be there alongside you, if not always physically, I will accompany you intellectually, spiritually, and sub–consciously."

In the spirit of Umoja (Unity), I say Peace!

A study of the black identity

African–American students from UMass and the four surrounding colleges are needed as participants in an important study that will be taking place this November through the first part of December. To understand what the UMass–Penn State Black Identity Study is all about, a few comments need to be made to put things into perspective. Perhaps the three most "investigated" aspects of black folk is our IQ, our family structure and our identity development. I want to address the last domain, as black identity development has been my life long passion.

Dr. Bill. Cross

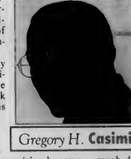
Recall that the Black Social Movement of the '60s and '70s had two phases, a civil rights phase (circa: 1954 through the late 1960s) and the black consciousness of black power phase (about 1965 to the late 1970s). Both the phases had an identity dynamic; however, it is the second phase which gave birth to concepts of "blackness," black identity or black consciousness, and the stages of Nigrescence (a French term that means the process of becoming black). From about 1970 up to the present, new black Ph.Ds, mostly in psychology, produced hundreds of essays and empirical studies exploring the relationship between black identity and such variables as achievement motivation, self–concept and reference group orientation, coping mechanism, internalized racism, and development across the lifespan.

One of the best examples of this literature is the new, must–read text by Beverly Tatum titled, Why Are All The Black Kids Sitting Together in the Cafeteria? Aside from Tatum's work, many researchers have often been too "quick" to design a measure of blackness one day, and use it in the field design a new measure with state–of–the–art psychometric properties is being explored right here at UMass.

The UMass–Penn State Black Identity Project is, as the name suggests, a joint venture involving scholars from Penn State and UMass. Beverly Vandiver, an African–American Counseling Psychologist, heads the Penn State operation, and I have the honor of steering the UMass effort. In both instances we are joined by a cluster of graduate students. For example, on my team are Christopher Lester, Ojae Beale, Torin Moore and Teeom Williams. We are now into the third year of field testing our emerging measure, and with each field testing, the instrument seems to be getting stronger.



We are very excited about the fact that instead of trying to measure only one or two elements of black identity, our measure seeks to tap into six or seven dimensions. If we are successful, our measure will be able to document just how variable black identity is from one person to the next. Starting about now, Ojae, Chris and other data collectors will be knocking on your door to ask for your participation in the current field testing effort. We hope many of you will help us out.

Finally, we also hope that in the not too distant future, we will be reporting back to you that our multi–year and step– by–step process has paid off in the creation of a black identity measure that is reliable and valid. Harambee.

Bill Cross is a professor in the School of Education at UMass.

An example of commitment: Alpha Phi Alpha

Community service, in my opinion, is one of the most effective and visible ways that black people can take an active part in improving their communities. Service to others who are less fortunate than you shows a tremendous amount of character and compassion; especially today in a society that seems persistent in spreading a message of apathy and selfishness.

Gregory H. Casimir

In a society where the mentality is, "Fk the world, don't ask me for st" it is quite reassuring that there exist some institutions geared towards helping our communities become better places to help ourselves and our children. One such organization is Alpha Phi Alpha Fraternity, Inc.

Although "Evening on the Nile" happened a week ago, the lasting significance of the event was that it was an example of the continual commitment that the Alphas have shown towards their agenda of community service. The theme of the evening was "Building our Future through Service and Education," and the fraternity of Alpha Phi Alpha has a well documented history of being pioneers in such ventures.

In 1920, Alpha Phi Alpha started the initiative "Go to High School, Go to College." This came about for meeting the necessity of African–Americans seeking higher education after high school. Seventy–six years later, the Alphas continued this initiative by conducting a nationwide "Finish High School, Go to College" program in 1996.

In addition to participating in acts of service, the Alphas took the time to give much deserved recognition to those individuals and organizations that are also champions of service to all. During the "Evening on the Nile," an awards commemoration took place. Awards were given to Renee Lopes and Delphine Quarles — women who have given so much to the UMass community. Anyone who has thrown a program knows how important it is to have Delphine on your side.

And how many of us would be here today, ducking that nasty pre–registration fee or getting into classes, if it wasn't for the kindness and Whitmore–savvy of Renee Lopes?

Too many times these women have helped their community selflessly. Their only motivation is their love for their people. But on the "Evening on the Nile," they were finally given the kind of recognition that people like them deserve.

The "Evening on the Nile" itself was a community service. It was a way of reminding us that we all have a local, and global responsibility to our communities. We can carry out this responsibility by participating in college activities like RSOs, the radio, UVC, student protests, or even writing for your school newspaper.

Alpha Phi Alpha Fraternity is a good model of an organization that shows a commitment to community service, but you don't have to be a part of a fraternity or a sorority to affect change in your community. There are plenty of organizations to join to implement change in your community. But the commitment all begins with you as an individual.

The Plight of a People: Possessing knowledge of black inventors

Have you ever heard the common statement, "Black people haven't contributed anything to our society?" This comment usually implies that black people have never invented anything — no technology, no ideas.

I have to admit, while growing up, I never came across an object or technology which someone told me was invented by a black person. This weekend, though, I came across a book that I've had for a while, but never really read. What I found was very interesting and informative. There is a whole section on black inventors and their inventions. The book is entitled, Encyclopedia of Black Folklore and Humor, by Henry David Spalding. The book as a whole is excellent, but I especially enjoyed the section on black inventors. I just thought I'd share with you a few of those inventors and their inventions.

"While growing up, I never came across an object or technology which someone told me was invented by a black person."

Edgar Barros

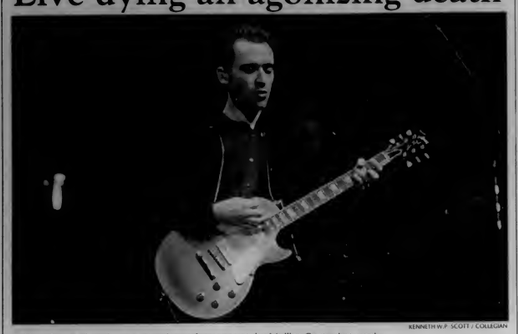
A man by the name of Benjamin Banneker was born in 1731. He was an inventor, mathematician and a gazeteer. He built the first clock to be made in America. He predicted the solar eclipse of 1789 and he published, Benjamin Banneker's Almanac, which was in circulation for more than 10 years. What I found to be his greatest accomplishment was his input in the layout and blueprints of what was to become the capitol of the United States — Washington, D.C.

To further compound this achievement when the head of this six man team (who basically designed the layout for D.C.) all of the sudden resigned and went back to France — with the plans, mind you — it was Banneker that reproduced the entire blueprint from memory!

Charles Drew, born in 1904, was a medical researcher. Dr. Drew, often called the father of the blood bank, invented the technique for separating and preserving blood. His technique saved countless lives in World War II, Korea and Vietnam. He went on to establish the first blood bank in England. He was also appointed director of the American Red Cross blood donor project. By the way, this great doctor attended school at neighboring Amherst College.

Garrett A. Morgan was an inventor born in 1877. The gas mask that is used in the military today is a modified version of Morgan's "gas inhalator" mask. Morgan's brother and two friends once saved seven men trapped 200 feet below lake Erie in a gas and smoke filled tunnel. His "gas inhalator" lead to the development of present day gas masks. Morgan also invented the automatic stop–sign, which he sold to General Electric for $40,000.



Daniel Male Williams, a doctor, was born in 1856. He was a pioneer in open heart surgery. This procedure has since saved countless lives all over the world. He also founded Provident Hospital in Chicago, which helped put an end to the racial inequalities that prevented Chicago's black doctors from utilizing the cities hospitals.

Other black inventors include A.B. Blackburn, who invented the railway signal and spring seat for chairs; Sarah Boone, who invented the ironing board. O.E. Brown invented the horseshoe and T. A. Carrington invented the cooking range. W.D. Davis invented the golf–tee. J. H. Hunter invented portable weighing scales and D.F. Jackson invented the gas burner. D. Johnson invented grass receivers for J.A. Burr who invented the lawn mower. J.L. Love invented the pencil sharpener. A. Miles invented the elevator. W.M. Richardson invented the child's carriage and J.W. Smith invented a lawn sprinkler. J. Standard invented a refrigerator and G.T. Woods invented a steam boiler furnace.

All of these inventions are patented and can all be found in Spalding's book. Interesting information, huh?

Live dying an agonizing death

KENNETH W.P. SCOTT / COLLEGIAN

Live played a less than spectacular performance at the Mullins Center last week.

By Kevin Monahan
Collegian Staff

LIVE / REEF
William D. Mullins Center
Nov. 13

Playing to a far from sold-out crowd at the Mullins Center last Thursday night, Pennsylvania rockers Live came to town to promote their third album Secret Samadhi, proving once again that bland commercial rock can at least fill half of a large venue.

Frontman Ed Kowalczyk — placed prominently upstage from the rest of the band members — exhibited the kind of raw emotion that could only be described as bad acting. Kowalczyk's attempts to connect with the audience came off as half-hearted and contrived. Live failed to give their "all" at any point during the show, demonstrating their lack of connection both with the crowd, and with each other.

Choosing a set consisting mostly of the mediocre material from Secret Samadhi, and the decent Throwing Copper (the album that boosted the band into a top slot in the alternative radio rotations), Live chose to ignore their superior debut album, 1991's Mental Jewelry.

The fact that they chose to play their accessible, generic songs that blend into the mainstream, rather than the songs that earned them a fan base and recording contract explains why longtime listeners are becoming disillusioned with the entire genre of music that labels itself "alternative rock."

With an audience vibe that tinkered between positive and neutral, Live opened the show with a cut from Secret Samadhi. The mostly bare stage with a white backdrop, appeared derivative when starkly lit against the band members' dark clothes and black equipment — resembling an early Cure video.

The most positive reactions elicited by Live came when they played the singles familiar to everybody in attendance. Songs such as "Selling the Drama" pleased the crowd, as well as Kowalczyk's dedication of "The Waitress," from Throwing Copper, to "Anyone who has ever worked in food service."

Their barely hour-long set was followed by an encore of the hit single "Lightning Crashes." Cigarette lighters raised high into the air, the crowd — singing along with Kowalczyk — helped fuel the moment enough to give one chills. It was one of a few redeeming moments.

The more interesting act Thursday night were openers Reef. They were an appropriate guest for Live, since neither band's music can be described as innovative. Hailing from England, Reef attack their audience with loud guitar-driven rock which sounds more American than British. However, their mostly inconsistent performance still managed to command attention from a largely disinterested audience.

Whether it be jumping into the aisles or sitting in a chair, Reef kept people watching by exerting energy in short, random bursts. Putting their soccer game backstage on hold, singer Gary Stringer offered some insights to their music.

He describes their style as "fresh rip" and "fueled by jedi mind tricks," and the wavering from typical British pop on their second album Glow as "a good thing." After opening a few more shows with Live, Reef will be embarking on a small U.S. club tour.

New changes in store for "Days"?

Jacob Fanning's Soap Chat

Hello my fellow soap fans and welcome to another edition of "Soap Chat." Before I sink my teeth into this week's agenda, I'd like to quickly mention a certain someone's letter to the editor last Monday entitled "Soaps Really Do Suck." If you didn't happen to catch the "argument" (I use the term loosely), this certain someone criticized the content of soaps as being "trash" and implied that fans of the genre were somehow lacking in the brain's department. Ouch! Well, I promised myself that I wouldn't dignify such crap with a response, but I've had a slight change of heart. Why? Quite simply because he had the audacity to insult my intelligence and furthermore that of every other soap fan. If he had kept his criticisms and insults to the matter at hand (the soap opera genre) I would've simply turned the other cheek (I mean, if I had a penny for every time someone has criticized the genre, I'd be a rich man... maybe even rich enough to be able to afford the tuition here).

Ah... I feel much better. Now for the meat of my article. Recently the infamous James E. Reily jumped the "Days of Our Lives" ship as head writer (although he still remains with the show as a consultant) to make room for Sally Sussman. Although her actual stories have yet to air, there have been small changes in the show's ambiance (Remember, these are just some preliminary opinions. It's still too early to give a hearty critique).

"Days of Our Lives" has always been one of those guilty pleasures for me (kind of like the Spice Girls). Like "Melrose Place," which I think is a hoot, it can be so vapid and campy that it almost becomes a parody of itself and the genre. Is it fun? You bet! I mean, if you're looking for a serious drama, "Days" is clearly not it but at the same time, that's what is so refreshing about it and what sets it apart from the rest. The show is its own entity. That's why the show has become one of the most popular (along with "General Hospital") soaps on TV and I'm glad to see that Miss Sussman hasn't tampered with it (so far). Susan's still as funny as ever, if not more and the theatrics are just as outrageous as they used to be.

The one thing that has impressed me about the recent changes is the element of tragedy that, until a few weeks ago, had been sorely missing from the show. The scenes involving Roman and his mother in the hospital (as Roman clung to life) were incredibly touching and were a much welcomed and needed change of pace. It's always good to throw a little tragedy into the mix. So far, I'd say that Miss Sussman is holding up quite nicely and has a firm grasp of the elements that has made the show such a success. I'm giving her a B (subject to change in a few months if need be).

Here's a few suggestions I'd like to make :

• Continue with the Mike/Carrie/Austin triangle. Finally you've found one that's actually interesting. I especially like seeing Carrie struggle with her feelings... I think it adds an interesting dynamic to an otherwise boring character.

• Have Sami focus her energies on something other than Austin (I'm at my wit's end here). How much story are they going to pump out of this stale and insipid plot? There is hope, however, as recent developments have hinted that she may dig her claws into breaking up Marlena and John. The possibilities are tantalizing!

• Continue to keep Eileen, preferably Kristin, in the spotlight. She's such an enigma and Eileen has proven to be one of the few aces "Days" has up its sleeve. Don't ignore this gem. I'd love to see Kristin duke it out with Stefano too. Can you imagine, Dimera vs. Dimera. Oh, I'd love it!

• Stop having the characters talk to themselves every few seconds. Actions and situations imply a character's state of mind. We don't need Kristin to tell us that she's crazy! We can draw our own conclusions so please... give us a little credit.

There are some exciting happenings this week on our fave soaps. Here's a few I thought worth mentioning (don't miss them).

Guiding Light: Reva and Cassie discover their true bond and unite to take down Annie and Alan. Abigail snaps with fatal consequences.

General Hospital: Stefan confronts Alexis! Bobbie and Carly share a "kodak" moment (this I have to see to believe. One more thing... it's been rumored that December 8th is going to be a crucial day. It's been said that the s hits the fan and that after that day nothing will ever be the same. Could it be that Bobbie finds out the truth about Carly?

One Life To Live: Max's children are kidnapped.

Port Charles: Rex's game claims another fatality (main character... who could it be?)

All My Children: Tim comes up with a plan to send Janet back to jail. In a bit of news, there has been some mumbling that Natalie make a return visit to Pine Valley very soon (in what form is anyone's guess but mine is that she'll return as a ghost).

Sink or Swim:
Sink:

• Bo on "Days." Talk about denial! He's giving advice to Mike saying that eventually he'll get over Carrie just like he "got over Hope." So much for her being the love of his life. It took all of what... three minutes for him to move on (if you want to call Billie moving on).

• I know I've said this before but Tim on "All My Children" is really starting to get to me. If anyone needs to be locked away in an asylum, it's him. Shut up already!

Swim :

• The custody trial begins on "Young & the Restless" between Phyllis and Michael. Let the games begin.

• Vanessa Marcil (Brenda on "General Hospital"). I'd like to give a shout out to one of daytime's most underappreciated actors (still no Emmy). Her portrayal of the betrayed and heartbroken Brenda has been stunning (especially her encounters with Jason and the female reporter at the Outback). I hope her passion and depth is acknowledged at next year's Daytime Emmys. I also want to express what a riot this whole condom issue between Sarah and Nik is. Thanks for the laughs "GH!"

• "AW's" blackout. Never has a blackout been so much fun... and passionate!

• Eve and Chris on "PC." Forget Scott and Eve, these two are a much more interesting duo.

If anyone has any comments or questions, I'd love to hear from them.

Penn State ends UM season 5–4

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

In collegiate field hockey, the penalty corner is a dangerous thing. It is a distinct advantage for the offensive team, which can pile as many as six or seven people onto the circle.

The defensive team, meanwhile, has only four field players and a goalie with which to protect its cage.

Penn St.	5
UMass	4

Saturday against Penn State in NCAA tournament first–round action, penalty corners proved to be Massachusetts' downfall.

The Lady Lions (18–5) converted on three of their eight corner opportunities to stave off the Minutewomen (13–10), 5–3.

"UMass played better than the way we were thinking they would," Penn State coach Char Morett said. "But our corners came through for us."

Penn State lost to Virginia, 4–2, in the second round yesterday.

The catalyst in the Lions' win was Dawn Lammey, a junior midfielder who came into the game as Penn State's leading scorer. Lammey finished the game with a goal and four assists.

Lammey's cause was aided by the efforts of Traci Anselmo. A sophomore midfielder, Anselmo connected on two penalty corner goals.

The Minutewomen, who have focused on maintaining defensive pressure in the game's first 10 minutes, went on the offensive early in the game. A feed from junior Kate Putnam found fellow junior Erica Johnston, and the forward put away a shot just 2:18 into the game.

The Lady Lions evened the score at one apiece on the first corner goal of the afternoon, just over 12 minutes into the first half. Kim Hicks and Lammey were credited with the assists on Anselmo's tally.

"We scored first, which is what we wanted to do," UMass coach Patty Shea said. "But we let them right back in. Their corners really hurt us."

A minute and a half later, UMass went to a combination that has worked for it all year long. Junior midfielder Vicky Browne found Johnston with a long assist, and Johnston beat Penn State goaltender Jamie Smith for her second of the afternoon.

Penn State, in return, again looked to Anselmo on the penalty corner. The sophomore did not disappoint, as Lammey and Hicks set up her second of the game.

The Lions finally claimed the lead with 1:33 left in the half on a Tracy Larson goal.

Freshman Kristen Schmidt knotted the game for third time with her unassisted goal early in the second half. Schmidt, who entered the game fifth on UMass' scoring chart, finished her rookie campaign with 11 points on five goals and one assist.

After Schmidt's tally, Penn State found its groove and worked past the Minutewomen for a pair of scores. Sonje Volla, whose sister Streya played for UMass from 1992 through her senior year as captain in 1995, capitalized on a penalty corner for the eventual game–winner. Lammey and Heather Gorlaski were awarded the assists at 54:07.

Lammey capped her afternoon by scoring a goal of her own late in the game. She worked the unassisted tally past UMass goalie Zowie Tucker with under five minutes to play.

and evaded that all year, and when the offense didn't produce, the defense came through for us.

"Today's game reflected the fact we are young, and realistically, young people tend to make mistakes, and you just hope to minimize those as much as you can. We'll be better for this in the long run."

For one of the youngsters, freshman Brooke Bartlett, now it is not a matter of the future, but a matter of the present. The loss ends the stellar four–year NCAA runs of the Minutewomen's tri–captains — Dion, Erica Iverson and Liz Rutherford — and while she will have a chance to taste NCAA success again, they will not.

"This is very disappointing, especially for the seniors," Bartlett said. "I feel very bad for them because we could have gone farther this season, and I have three more to go, and they don't."

Iverson has been a catalyst for UMass the past few seasons, never more than the 2–1 triple overtime win last season over Harvard in the first round of the NCAA's. The then–junior defender scored the equalizer in regulation, and her crossing pass resulted in the Crimson's own goal in the 132nd minute of the late fall classic.

To her, in the name of payback alone, there never was any better motivation for Harvard to come out and win this NCAA rematch.

"I can't think of a better pep talk than to remember what we did to them last year," Iverson said. "Frankly, they came out as the better team, and they deserve to go on."

This is the end of the road for last weekend's A–10 Tournament MVP, and three–time All–Conference selection, but Iverson will save her goodbyes for much later. An injury–riddled season from the start for the entire team ended the way it started — with questions lingering in the air.

"It hasn't hit me yet," Iverson said. "I think I'll probably cry a little later. Right now, it's just... it was cold, it was tough. But, I don't know if the cold was the problem, or if it still was our leftover injuries, but I think we would've had a better chance if we were 100 percent."

■ coach

packed press room that he didn't think he could coach again. After 20 years at Massachusetts, Hodges said that the University has become too much a part of his life and he would love to stay at UMass in another capacity if possible. Marcum called Hodges "an asset to any athletic program," and said he would like to keep Hodges in the athletic department in an as–yet undetermined capacity.

Hodges came to UMass in 1978 after nine years as an assistant coach at Colby College. Hodges was an assistant under Bob Pickett from 1978–1986, before becoming defensive coordinator under Jim Reid. Hodges replaced Reid, the popular and current Richmond coach, in 1992. Hodges was named New England Division I coach of the year in his first half, after leading UMass to an 8–3 record.

"I've got great memories of UMass," said Hodges, citing last year's "Miracle at McGuirk" and the 1978 NCAA playoff win over Nevada–Reno as some career highlights.

"This is a great football program with a fantastic tradition, and I've been extremely proud to have been a part of it for 20 years. I love this football program, but it's time to make a change. UMass needs a jumpstart, someone to come in and shake things up."

Hodges said he had been disappointed with some of the recent the Minutemen had posted in recent years. UMass went 5–6 in 1994 and 6–5 in both 1995 and 1996. Hodges knew 1997 would be tough, he said, because of the youth of his team, but added that injuries made this season "ridiculous."

Marcum said he has already received inquiries about the opening. Bill Strickland, who recently moved from Sports Information Director to Associate Athletic Director for External Affairs, will chair a search committee to be filled out shortly.

"I feel very comfortable with what I've done here, and I feel very proud of what I've [accomplished]," Hodges said. "We did it the right way, we did it my way."

points during the Marathon run.

With 6:47 to go, Basit checked back in and immediately made an impact. The 6–foot–9 forward came down with a rebound on the defensive end and the Minutemen pushed the ball up the floor. Mike Babul spotted up on the wing and knocked down a three–pointer to cut the Marathon lead to 59–53.

After a pair of Minlend three–pointers built the Marathon lead back to 65–55, UMass went on a 10–1 run to close within 66–65 on a Mack (14 points) jumper with 54 seconds remaining.

Minlend grabbed an offensive board and made a lay–up to push the lead back to three. Flint called a play for Mack, but the Minutemen couldn't convert and Mack didn't get a shot off before the buzzer.

"UMass is going to win a lot of ball games," Marathon coach Glenn Sergent said. "I can't see them winning the Atlantic 10, but they'll certainly raise Cain."

Saturday's numbers helped catapult him over former greats Rene Ingoglia (656 yds.) and John Johnson (729 yds.) for the record.

Hodges had the pleasure of coaching each of these men and admits that Shipp is in a class of his own.

"We had a brand new offensive line in there, and he's still ripping off some numbers," Hodges said. "He's a humble man. With his work ethic, he's going to be something special."

Shipp still has three years left to dazzle at UMass, unlike eight of his teammates. Defensive ends Jeron Alston and Mike Dawson, defensive tackle Mike Batelli, quarterback Anthony Catterton, free safety Bryan Mooney, wide receiver Darryl Thomas, offensive lineman Geoff Thomas and defensive back Jason Thomas all suited up for the final time Saturday. Though a small graduating class, Hodges knows they made a big impact on the program.

"They've stuck together through some tough times," Hodges said. "When you go 2–9, there can be some ugly things going on in the locker room. But these kids went out there and played like hell."

short. Meanwhile, the Minutewomen challenged consistently at the Wagner end of the court.

Van Huisen, who hit the shot that silenced the Seahawks last season, finishing with a career–high 24 points, two assists and three rebounds.

"Kelly was Kelly," O'Brien said. "She got into a good flow. The difference between this year and last year for her was her decisions. She knew when to shoot the three, when to pass."

Van Huisen combined with fellow sophomore Alison MacFarland (14 points) to bolster UMass.

"A big difference for both Kelly and Alison is their conditioning. This time last year I think they were both saying, 'Lord, have mercy,'" O'Brien said.

After UMass closed the first half on a Tez Kraft jump shot that increased the UMass edge to 16, the Minutewomen carried their momentum into the second frame. A pair of three–pointers from Van Huisen spurred a 15–0 UMass run, that continued until Deandra Teague's jumper stopped the onslaught with just under 13 minutes remaining in regulation.

Wagner, though, could not chip away at the Minutewomen advantage. Twice in the game's last 10 minutes the Seahawks, who saw only limited action from senior Susan Moffet, were within 21, but they could not move any closer.

The win puts UMass in good position heading into a four– game, three–week road swing.

"This week, we're going to focus on taking care of our business," O'Brien said.

■ Van Huisen

started 25. She was second on the team in scoring, first in three point field goal percentage, and second in assists. She stayed at UMass over the summer, lifting weights and conditioning herself.

"I think my stamina is what's really picked up this year, compared to last year, " Van Huisen said. "Now I feel like I can just keep going."

Coach O'Brien also pointed out an improvement in Van Huisen's maturity level and her decision making.

"I think the biggest difference between this year and last year was her decisions, when to spot and shoot the three and when to take it to the basket."

"She really does it all," Roecker said. "She hits the three, she drives, she finishes, she pulls up, she plays great D. You can't really say enough about her."

Understanding Eating Disorders:
Strategies for Friends and Families
Tuesday, October 14, 1997
Room 904-08
6:30 - 8 p.m. - Murray Lincoln Campus Center, UMass

I think my roommate has an eating disorder.
How can I be sure? What should I do?
I think my sister is anorexic and she isn't getting any help.
How can I convince her to see a professional?
Who should I suggest.. Where should she go?
I'm concerned about my friend who has bulimia.
She says it's under control, but I don't think it is.
I'm really afraid... What can I do to help?

If you are concerned about someone who you know or suspect is struggling with an eating disorder, come to this informal workshop to explore how you can help and cope with these issues.

Horoscopes

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — Take time out to assess situations as they develop today, and you can avoid the kinds of pitfalls which threaten others quite regularly.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — You are on the verge of an error which could set you back quite far. However, you can avoid any such misstep if you're prudent and prepared.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — See if you can't negotiate for a little more time and a little more money before going ahead with a newly assigned project.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — Now is the time for you to take a more aggressive approach to solving a problem that has been hanging over you for some time.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — You may have a chance to redefine yourself in some way today, provided you are willing to adopt a new approach as soon as possible.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — Someone may be trying to put you off the scent today, but you are not likely to be swayed by anything so obvious and heavy-handed.

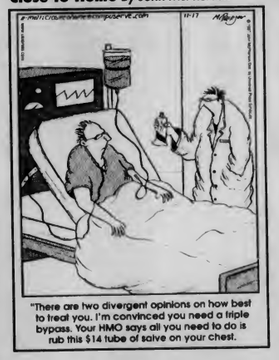
TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — Seek out those who share your point of view, and you'll be able to work more efficiently in a cooperative setting. Do not be too stubborn.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — You are in a favorable position at this time, but you don't want to risk it by asking for too much from those who are in authority.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — A little careful prodding should land you the information you require at this time. Take care that you don't give away all your secrets.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — Today, you may find yourself in a difficult position which requires more in the way of tact and diplomacy than you are used to exercising.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — Pacing is all–important today, and you will enjoy the benefits of good timing and the occasional break almost immediately. Do not push yourself.



LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — Others are counting on you to take the reins very soon and lead them out of professional danger. You have what it takes; don't delay!

Massachusetts football coach Mike Hodges resigns

Coach leaves after 20 years

By Luke Meredith
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts football coach Mike Hodges, saying the program needed a "shake-up," resigned Saturday, moments after the Minutemen's season-ending 49–9 loss to Connecticut. Hodges guided UMass to a 34–31 record in his tenure, but took the blame for this year's 2–9 record, the worst campaign by Massachusetts since 1953. Hodges coached at UMass for 20 years, the last six as head coach.

The entire coaching staff has also been fired, according to UMass athletic director Bob Marcum. A nationwide search for a replacement will begin immediately.

"Every decision I have made in the past six years has been based on what I feel is best for this program... and I think that what is best for this program is that I resign as the head football coach," said Hodges in the post–game press conference. "We need some new leadership in here. This program needs a new direction."

Hodges said he met with Marcum on Friday, Nov. 7, the day before a 33–8 loss to winless Boston University, to inform Marcum of his decision. He said he told his family earlier in the week, and informed both his staff and players right before the game on Saturday. Hodges maintains that, despite speculation Marcum probably wouldn't have renewed his contract — due to run out in May 1998 — the decision to step down was entirely his.

"I talked about the situation last week," Hodges said. "And Mr. Marcum certainly didn't try to talk me out of it, I can tell you that."

UMass suffered through a dismal 1997 campaign, one that saw the Minutemen limp to its worst record (2–9) since a 1– 7 mark in 1953. The Minutemen finished the season with four straight losses, by a combined score of 173–39. UMass lost five games at Warren McGuirk Stadium, which opened in 1967, for the first time ever, and lost six games by over 20 points. But the biggest knock on Hodges had been his inability to win a conference title. The current drought — UMass hasn't won a conference title since 1990 — is the longest since 1960.

Hodges, well–liked by players, fans and the media and long known for his loyalty to the school, told a

UM blown out 49–9 in finale

By Corey Peter Goodman

The University of Massachusetts football team knew its season finale contest with Connecticut Saturday would be a farewell game to its eight graduating seniors — most of whom spent four years in Amherst.

However, UMass football said good–bye to 20 years of football history when head coach Mike Hodges resigned minutes after his team was trampled by the Huskies, 49–16, before 2,870 at Warren P. McGuirk Stadium.

Connecticut	49
Massachusetts	9

Despite compiling 457 yards of total offense, the Minutemen (2–9, 1–7) put the ball in the end zone only once in 59 minutes of play. Three crucial turnovers put a dent in UMass' final numbers. UMass added a late score with just 15 seconds remaining in the game. This failure to convert near the goal line led to a frustrating afternoon and season for Hodges.

"This game was a mirror of the whole season," Hodges said. "We moved the ball well all day, but we turned it over. You can't afford to do that."

Connecticut (7–3, 4–3) erased any hopes of a "Miracle at McGuirk II" with 28 points in a span of just over nine minutes to open the second half. UMass trailed at the half, 21–3.

Connecticut quarterback Shane Stafford went to the air more often than not in the second half, racking up 260 yards in the final two quarters. Stafford finished the day with three touchdowns on 14–for–26 passing for 340 yards. He was not sacked once.

UMass quarterback Anthony Catterton had an excellent day in the losing effort. In his final collegiate performance, Catterton completed 16 passes for 245 yards and a touchdown. He was sacked three times.

The highlight of the afternoon for UMass was the performance of freshman tailback Marcel Shipp. The Paterson, New Jersey product capped off a tremendous season with a 121 yard effort on 17 carries. Shipp also had 75 yards receiving and 33 yards of kickoff returns.

With his success on the ground, Shipp became UMass' top freshman back ever with 766 yards on the season.

Harvard cuts Minutewomen season short

Cold weather, fluke goals do in No. 20 Massachusetts in Boston

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

CAMBRIDGE — As sports metaphors go, if you dip from the well too many times, it will run dry. Nevermind geographical science, the influence of watersheds on well water and so on. If you rely on something too much, it just might run out on you.

After the No. 20 Massachusetts women's soccer team's 2– 0 loss to No. 17 Harvard in the first round of the watershed of Div. I competition — the NCAA Tournament — the well was literally dry. A recently slumping offense which still bragged three players to score over 30 points this season was ineffectual from the start, and after two first half goals of the fluky nature, the Minutewomen could not bounce back in the mortally cold conditions at Ohiri Field.

Harvard	2
Massachusetts	0

The first 20 minutes of the match was all UMass, and after a shot from sophomore Emma Kurowski flew over the crossbar in the first few minutes, a golden opportunity to get an early lead blew away in the bone–chilling wind.

In the 16th minute, Minutewoman freshman Kara Green fought off two defenders on the right flank, and then served the ball into open space to the right of sophomore goalkeeper Anne Browning. Sophomore Kate Webb had Browning on a one–on–one, but the recent propensity to knock the ball up towards the keeper's hands for the UMass offense instead of low and to the corners struck the team again, and a prospective 1–0 score was still knotted at 0–0.

After that the Crimson took over the game, allowing only seven shots on Browning, while forcing senior keeper Danielle Dion to make 16 saves by game's end. Two goals by freshman walk–on Erin Aeschliman at the 29:45 and 42:56 marks — the first two of her career — capped the win for Harvard, and they now face the winner of yesterday's George Mason/Maryland match next weekend.

For UMass coach Jim Rudy, the lack of a consistent offensive presence the past few weeks can be wrapped up in one word.

"Experience," Rudy said. "We have our weak spots, and our soft spots in terms of injuries and youth, and playoffs are when you exploit those factors. We've sort of avoided

Women's hoop open with 72–47 victory

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

After last Monday's exhibition game against Rossiyanka, Massachusetts women's basketball coach Joanie O'Brien called the preseason game a learning experience.

Yesterday, in their season opener at the William D. Mullins Center, the Minutewomen (1–0) put what they have learned thus far on display, and cruised to their first win in impressive fashion, 72–47 over Wagner College (0–1).

Massachusetts	72
Wagner	47

The game represented a complete turnaround from the last time the two teams met. Last year, a last–second three– pointer from Kelly Van Huisen lifted UMass to a 70–67 overtime win in New York. This time around, the Minutewomen wasted little time in putting the game out of reach.

It took a while for both teams to find the basket, but when they scored, they did so from downtown. Five of the first six baskets from the field — for both teams — were from beyond the arc. Unfortunately for the Seahawks, only a pair fell their way.

The spark UMass created on offense resonated with its defense. Just under six minutes into the first half, Wagner was within five, 11–6. Intense defensive pressure from the Minutewomen, however, allowed the Seahawks no closer. In fact, with 4:18 remaining in the period, UMass held its largest lead of the first half, 31–12.

"Their press looked like it was in midseason form," Wagner coach Pam Roecker said. "Their press was more of a factor today than it was last year. We had a hard time getting into our offensive sets. It took 18 seconds to get the ball into any kind of play."

When the Seahawks did find a play, the effort more often than not fell

UMass' Van Huisen drops 24 on Wagner

By Jackie Leroux

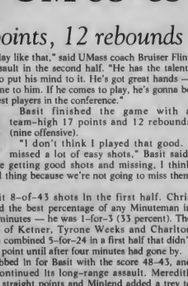
Sophomore guard Kelly Van Huisen has single–handedly scared away the Wagner Seahawks. When Wagner head coach Pam Roecker was asked whether she would like to continue their series with the Massachusetts' women's basketball team, she responded by asking, "When does Van Huisen graduate?"

In yesterday's blowout of the Seahawks, Van Huisen dominated. She had 24 points, on 9 for 16 shooting. She also grabbed three rebounds, two assists and a steal.

She's a great player," Roecker said. "We thought we had one of our best players on her. She's just so quick, so strong, very aggressive at both ends."

Last year, Van Huisen was the hero for UMass when they took on Wagner in the Wagner Christmas Tournament last December. After playing poorly in regulation, Van Huisen scored all nine of UMass' points in the overtime period, including a three pointer that won the game for the Minutewomen.



"Last year might have been a fluke," Van Huisen said. "This year I just came out and got into the flow of things real quick, and shot the ball well."

Last year Van Hulsen was named to the All–Atlantic 10 Rookie team. This year she was named to the Atlantic–10 second team, but Roecker was quick to put her on the first.

"I think she's got a real shot to be an Atlantic–10 first– teamer this year, to make the jump from the second team and just go right to the first," Roecker said.

Kelly was a pleasant surprise for UMass head coach Joanie O'Brien last year, quickly making herself a key player. She played in all 28 games, and Despite a late second half rally by the Massachusetts men's basketball team, Marathon's long range bombers kept the Minutemen at bay and allowed for a 68–65 victory at the William D. Mullins Center Saturday night.

Marathon	68

Marathon led from the gun to the finish line, hitting 10 three–pointers (seven in the second half) and building leads as big as 13 In the second half — a Charles Minlend trey made the score 46–33 at about the 13–minute mark.

Minlend was 5–for–6 from behind the arc (4–for–4 in the second half) and led Marathon with 26 points and 12 rebounds. Mark Meredith was 4–for–7 from downtown and chipped in 16 points.

After Marathon took Its 13–point lead, Ajmal Basit took over.

Lari Ketner — who was 4–for–17 from the field — hit a pair of free throws to close the gap to 11, then Basit went on a personal 8–2 run. He had three offensive rebounds in that stretch, and scored on four straight UMass possessions to draw the Minutemen within five points, 48–43.

"He can play like that," said UMass coach Bruiser Flint of Basit's assault in the second half. "He has the talent, he just has to put his mind to it. He's got great hands — balls just come to him. If he comes to play, he's gonna be one of the best players in the conference."

Basit finished the game with a team–high 17 points and 12 rebounds (nine offensive).

"I don't think I played that good. I missed a lot of easy shots," Basit said. "Since we're getting good shots and missing, I think that's a good thing because we're not going to miss them all year."

UMass hit 8–of–43 shots In the first half. Chris Kirkland had the best percentage of any Minuteman in the first 20 minutes — he was 1–for–3 (33 percent). The triumvirate of Ketner, Tyrone Weeks and Charlton Clarke was a combined 5–for–24 in a first half that didn't see a UMass point until after four minutes had gone by.

Weeks subbed in for Basit with the score 48–43, and Marathon continued Its long–range assault. Meredith scored eight straight points and Minlend added a trey to push the lead up to 59–50. The South Boston connection of Monty Mack and Jonathan DePina tried to keep UMass close with seven

Canadian group up in arms over Stern

TORONTO (AP) —A broadcast watchdog group complained of abusive and sexist remarks by "shock jock" Howard Stern and reprimanded the two Canadian radio stations that carry his show.

The Canadian Broadcast Standards Council, established by the industry to oversee its own ethics code, ruled Nov. 11 that Montreal's CHOM-FM and Toronto's Q-107 violated the code when they aired offensive remarks by Stern.

Stern, who revels in controversy generated by his New York-based syndicated show, made an explosive debut in Canada in early September. On the first show, he referred to French Quebeckers as "peckerheads" and "scumbags" and belittled their efforts to promote the French language over English.

The watchdog council said each episode of Stern's show in the first week of September contained "abusive or discriminatory comments aimed at French-Canadians and other identifiable groups."

Nichols implicated in arms robbery

DENVER (AP) —Armor-piercing ammunition found in Terry Nichols' home after the Oklahoma City bombing was stolen from an Arkansas gun show business, a partner in the business testified yesterday. The ammunition found at Nichols' home was separated into small plastic bags stamped "LC," indicating it was military surplus, said Karen Anderson, who runs a gun show business with Roger Moore. Ms. Anderson said she knew the ammunition belonged to their business because the LC marking came from a stamp she has owned since childhood.

In 1989, Ms. Anderson and Moore formed a gun-show business called American Assault Co., or The Candy Store, specializing in "exotic ammunition," she said. In the business, she sold ammunition, while Moore sold guns.

Authorities say Nichols robbed the business of $60,000 worth of explosives, ammunition and cash in November 1994 to finance the bomb plot. Defense attorneys have questioned whether the robbery ever happened, contending Moore was a friend of Timothy McVeigh's. Ms. Anderson testified as prosecutors won motions paving the way for Moore's testimony.

Alcohol on campus: history of the problem

By Tamar Carroll & Jonathan Liberty
Collegian Staff

Editor's note: This is part one of a three–part series concerning the present state of the use and abuse of alcohol within the University of Massachusetts and Amherst communities. The series will run consecutively today, tomorrow and Thursday.

Every weekend, thousands of University of Massachusetts students get drunk. And every weekend, the repercussions are felt throughout the campus and the surrounding community.

A November 1996 Project Pulse survey found that 85 percent of UMass students identify themselves as drinkers, and that 75 percent of those students were intoxicated in the past month.

"Alcohol removes inhibition and gives you permission to act in ways you ordinarily wouldn't," Sally Damon, community health educator at UHS.

Over one–third of the drinkers reported consuming four to six drinks per sitting and 36 percent reported drinking once or twice a week.

The drunk students frequently harm themselves and others in the community as they create disturbances, vandalize dorms and bars, start fights with each other and bystanders, sexually assault fellow students and drive drunk.

On Nov. 10, the Monday before Veteran's Day (a day with no scheduled classes), intoxicated students kept UMass police busy with alcohol–related calls, according to Deputy Chief Barbara O'Connor.

Between 11:22 p.m. and 3 a.m., police were called to deal with several noise complaints, a vandalized car, a "Round Robin" in violation of the liquor code and a 15–person fight in Southwest Residential Area alone.

"On an average Monday night those calls are not going to exist, and this was even on a night when a lot of people had gone home," O'Connor said.

The Project Pulse survey also revealed problematic effects of student drinking. Students reported that 45 percent of drinkers had gotten into a car with a drunk driver at least once in the past year, while 17 percent had driven drunk. Thirteen percent of the drinkers experienced trouble with police and nine percent injured themselves while intoxicated.

Sally Damon, community health educator at University Health Services (UHS) said that drinkers engage in many of these problem behaviors because alcohol has impaired their judgement.

"Alcohol removes inhibition and gives you permission to act in ways you ordinarily wouldn't," Damon said. "Alcohol is often used to forget about problems of physical or emotional pain."

In the town of Amherst, drunken behavior has resulted in a flood of calls for service to the Amherst police department. In the fiscal year 1995–96, 1,153 noise complaints were registered, while there were 413 accounts of vandalism and 132 fights. In directly alcohol–related charges, there were 55 DUI's, 110 open containers and 71 improper persons in possession of alcohol.

In addition to engaging in problem behaviors, students who drink heavily may experience short–term health problems such as nausea, vomiting, suppressed immune system and black–outs. They also risk incurring long–term health problems such as liver disease, depression and sleep disorders.

Trina Hope, coordinator of the Response Team at Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton, said doctors and nurses in their emergency room have noticed "far more" alcohol related incidents this fall than in the past, including stabbings, fights and assaults.

"Many of the incidents that are treated in the ER don't make the news, like fights and people with pancreatitis," Hope said. "Suicide attempts related to substance abuse normally wouldn't happen if the person wasn't drunk."

Problems highlighted by recent events

The many issues surrounding student drinking, although longstanding, were brought into focus this semester by several high–profile events on–campus and in the surrounding community.

In early September, fights and stabbings on Hobart Lane and Main Street resulted in sophomore Luis Cerda being stabbed in the neck with a broken beer bottle and sophomore Stephen Murphy repeatedly kicked and punched in the head.

These assaults led to increased awareness of the problematic effect of student drinking on the community, which became even more apparent later that month.

"On a campus this size, any attempts at banning [alcohol] will not be effective. It is just not feasible." Chancellor David K. Scott"

At the Homecoming football game, Sept. 27, campus authorities were disturbed by the rampant excessive drinking at tailgating parties and resultant inappropriate behavior. Chancellor David K. Scott vowed to end abuse of alcohol at tailgating.

"I had observed that tailgating at the football game was a disaster waiting to happen... and so I have decided to discontinue the experiment where tailgating was allowed as a waiver of our policy against consumption of alcohol in open spaces," Scott said. "This experiment has been a failure, and it will be discontinued starting Oct. 25."

In the early morning hours of Sept. 27, junior Adam G. Prentice was found dead due to massive bleeding after a fall through a campus greenhouse roof. The cause of his fall is still being investigated by UMass police, however toxicology reports indicated Prentice's blood alcohol level was 0.12 — above the legal driving limit of 0.08.

His death, along with nationally publicized alcohol–caused deaths of students at Massachusetts Institute of Technology and Louisiana State University in September and August, respectively, forced administrators to critically evaluate alcohol abuse on campus.

Winter's first snow results in five arrests

By Leigh Faulkner
Collegian Staff

Following the first snowfall, University of Massachusetts police were busy responding to on campus snowball fights, which resulted in the arrest of five individuals.

UMass Police responded to more than 15 calls of snowball fights on campus beginning shortly before midnight on Friday until the early morning hours on Sunday.

At 1:48 a.m. police responded to an individual throwing snowballs at other individuals in Butterfield Residence Hall.

Rijik S. Gupta, 19, was arrested for disorderly conduct and assault and battery because he failed to comply to the request of police officers to stop throwing snowballs.

Early Sunday morning, police arrested four individuals on the corner of Sunset Avenue and Massachusetts avenue for throwing snowballs.

Brett M. Owens, 18, and Eric M. Lagstein, 20, were arrested for disorderly conduct, assault and battery with a shod foot and resisting a police officer making a lawful arrest.

Two other individuals, Ryan Matthew Owens, 19, and Michael Robert Palaza, 19, were also arrested at the scene for disorderly conduct and resisting a police officer making a lawful arrest.

All four individuals attempted to flee the scene to avoid arrests.

According to UMass Police Chief Jack Luippold, two of the responding officers were injured while making the arrests, one receiving shoulder injuries and the other receiving elbow injuries.

Luippold said that while one individual was being arrested another individual got in the middle attempting to stop the arrest and resulting in the officers' injuries.

In addition to responding to calls concerning snowball fights, a major concern of the UMPD was making sure no groups of UMass students went to Amherst College, Luippold said.

Following a winter storm last spring semester, a large group of UMass students went to Amherst College to have a snowball fight. Many windows and other items on the Amherst College campus were broken as well as a few people being injured from the snowballs.

UMass participates in the Great American Smokeout

By Leigh Faulkner
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts students, faculty and staff who smoke and have been thinking about quitting can begin on Nov. 20 during the 17th annual Great American Smokeout.

Beginning today thru Nov. 20, health educators from University Health Services will be sponsoring a table in the Campus Center concourse to provide information and support to those trying to quit.

Prizes such as t–shirts will be given to those who turn in a pack of cigarettes for attempting to quit. In addition, stress kits will also be distributed.

The health educators will also be sponsoring other events on Wednesday and Thursday in an effort to get more students to participate in the Smokeout and to let them become familiar with support and services available to them.

Tomorrow, a movie titled, "A Pack of Lies," will be shown, which portrays the role of advertising in the tobacco industry and how they peg certain populations.

Also tomorrow night, students have the option of attending a hypnosis session from 7– 9:30 p.m. The session, which is sponsored by the Amherst Tobacco Control Program, is free but participants must pre–register by calling 256–4077.

Kathleen Pew, Director of the Pioneer Valley Hypnosis Institute, will lead the session and offer coping strategies and relaxation techniques to help the fight nicotine addiction.

On Thursday, the day of the Great American Smokeout, Acupuncturist Lynn Curry will hold a lecture, discussion and demonstration at 1 p.m. in Campus Center room 805.

"The Great American Smoke Out is a day where nationally people are asked to quit smoking for a day. Not smoking for one day can already have a positive effect on a person's health," said Suzanne Gillert, Health educator from UHS.

According to information released by the American Cancer Society, 20 minutes after a person has stopped smoking, blood pressure returns to a level close to that before the last cigarette and the temperature of the person's hands and feet increases to normal.

After eight hours of no smoking, the carbon monoxide levels in the blood stream drops to normal and 24 hours with out smoking decreases a person's chances of a heart attack.

"The Smokeout is very successful In having people thinking about smoking and thinking about quitting," Gillert said. "It is very difficult for many people to quit smoking. Most are not successful on their first try."

According to Gillert, the average person tries eight times to quit smoking.

"For some people the Smokeout may be their goal to stop smoking, for others it may be the first step in the right direction. For many, it is

O'Brien speaks on importance of stories

By Tamar Carroll
Collegian Staff

Award winning author Tim O'Brien said it is the stories of everyday life that matter in the end.

Last night, in the University of Massachusetts Student Union Ballroom, O'Brien spoke to over 250 students and faculty about his life experiences and the inspirations for his writing.

In his lecture, entitled "The Writer's Life," O'Brien sought to show the importance of stories to all of our lives.

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

Tim O'Brien enjoys a laugh during his lecture yesterday night, which was sponsored by the Distinguished Visitor's Program.

"I don't know anything except stories — they matter to me," O'Brien said. "Stories somehow matter in our lives, they have a capacity to help us heal, to console us, and to make sense of our lives."

His job as a fiction writer, O'Brien said, is to tell people stories that express the truths of his life in ways that will "somehow squeeze your hearts and make you feel a little of what I felt [at that time in my life]."

To demonstrate his point, O'Brien captivated the audience with three stories from his youth.

The most powerfull of the three chronicled his agony in deciding whether to flee to Canada to avoid fighting in the Vietnam war.

During the summer of 1968, while he awaited his induction into the services in August, O'Brien said, he got a job at a meat factory butchering pigs.

The constant presence of blood at the factory tormented O'Brien with premonitions of the war in Vietnam and ultimately drove him to flee to the Canadian border.

"You can imagine what my dreams were like that summer," O'Brien said. "For me, that factory was not just a metaphor for Vietnam —— it was all around me."

One day, O'Brien said, he cracked and drove north for eight straight hours, approaching the Canadian border and safety from the draft.

"Rationality left me and I just ran for my life," O'Brien said.

He wound up staying in a place called the Tip Top Lodge for the next six days, agonizing over his decision.

"Those were the six most important day of my life," O'Brien said.

"This was a trillion times worse than Vietnam. I felt as though I had been split in half."

Ultimately, he was unable to leave his country and the people he loved forever.

"I could have been in Canada," O'Brien said. "But I knew I was not going to Canada. I knew I was a coward and that I would be going to Vietnam. I knew that I was not capable of saying no to this war. I was terrified of exile."

A few months later, O'Brien said, he was being shot at as he walked through rice patties In Vietnam.

O'Brien then surprised the audience by revealing that the three stories were not actual moments in his life. Although he did agonize over whether to skip the draft in the summer of 1968, he never drove to the Canadian border. He created those scenes to dramatize his situation and make it "larger than life".

"These stories are all made–up," O'Brien said. "I am a fiction writer. That's my job."

However, O'Brien said, the factual truth of the stories was not the important thing.

"The fact that something is invented should be irrelevant to big issues of truth," O'Brien said. "I was giving you access through make–believe to the truth of what I was."

Good fiction writing, O'Brien said, condenses a life into its critical points.

"You boil things down into what one feels is the distilled essence of the matter," O'Brien said. "That's what good stories can do. They're built on a kernel of truth, but they go way beyond it."

Panel discusses God and science

By Sarah J. Kimmel
Collegian Staff

The second panel discussion of the Inter-Religious Forum took place last night from 7 p.m. to 9 p.m. in Herter 231. The discussion, entitled "Science and Religion," argued the relationship between the two fields.

The forum, created by University of Massachusetts history professor Will Johnston, is currently a week-long series that will hopefully, according to Johnston, result in future events.

Johnston's goal is to encourage students to learn the diverse avenues for spirituality that are available to them in the Five College area.

"If you study religions," Johnston said, "you see that they have common traits and aspirations. The Inter-Religious Project will not only help students clarify their own traditions, but enable them to enlarge their spiritual identity to include aspects of other traditions."

The panelists for "Science and Religion" were Albey Reiner, Dick Teresi, Christopher Carlisle and Kimberly Quinell.

Reiner is a UMass microbiology professor and the recipient of the 1994 Case Massachusetts Teacher of the Year Award. He received his PhD in molecular biology at Harvard.

Teresi is the co-author of "The God Particle" and a journalist for several magazines such as The New York Times Book Review, The New York Times Magazine, Penthouse and The Lutheran.

Carlisle is the UMass Episcopal Chaplain. He received his theological degrees from Harvard and Yale.

Quinell is a senior at Mount Holyoke College majoring in chemistry and minoring in biology. She is a representative of the Baha'i Faith Community, a religion which emphasizes science education and feels collectively that science should be considered an act of worship.

Each panelist began by stating their view of the debate between science and religion. The topic centered around truth and the quest for that truth. The main argument is that the general mindset of scientists is that they need proof to believe something. Teresi said, "Religious beliefs should survive all evidence... Your beliefs tend to be unfalsifiable... they can't be proven true but they can't be proven false either. Scientists believe what's in pencil. They are supposed to be able to get rid of their in a moments notice [once the old information is proven false]."

Other topics discussed were the importance of education, the appearance of physical miracles, the use of language, The Big Bang Theory, faith and spirituality.

Quinell brings science and religion together by saying that "they both rely on a great deal of faith."

Reiner drew a similarity between the two faculties using the duality of sins saying that, "the greatest sin in science is to throw away data."

The second hour of the discussion was used for questions from the audience. Many asked of the meaning of God and the essence of spirit. The final question was asked by Sam Dean, a UMass graduate student, who answered all of these questions using a word that was not mentioned once in the previous two hours.

He said, "The essence of God is love."

ALANA lecturer to speak at UM

Voy Fernandes
Collegian Correspondent

Another prominent ALANA series lecturer is set to speak here at the University of Massachusetts.

Professor Jose Rossy-Millan, will be lecturing on "The State of the Latino community in the U.S.: Challenges and Opportunities" in the Campus Center Auditorium at 7 p.m. Rossy-Millan is visiting UMass as part of the Latin American Lecturers, sponsored by the Office of ALANA Affairs.

Professor Rossy-Millan has taught Latin American Studies, Cultural Diversity, Psychology and Human Services at several campuses including the City University of New York (CUNY). Professor Rossy-Millan effectively blends facts, humor and anecdotes to engage students in an honest examination of commonly held assumptions about contemporary Latino issues.

Born in Santurce, Puerto Rico, Professor Rossy-Millan attended the University of Puerto Rico where he completed a B.A. and an M.A. degree in counseling. He earned a second M.A. in Psychology from The State University of New York (SUNY), and is a doctoral candidate in Clinical Psychology at Antioch New England graduate school.

Combinations of his own life mixed with those of his former students and clients is what makes Rossy-Millan entertaining and inspirational. An activist himself in Puerto Rico, Rossy-Millan can effectively motivate today's college students to assume a more active role in defense of their beliefs.

In response as to why this particular lecturer had been selected among many others, Nelson Acosta, Director of Office of ALANA Affairs said, "We wanted to bring a speaker who could provide some of that information and could talk about issues on a national perspective and who could bridge all the gap in the Latin-American communities."

Professor Jose Rossy-Millan comes to campus as part of the ALANA lecture series

Jose Rossy-Millan is who came to mind.

The ALANA lecture series provides a diversified list of lecturers for the ALANA students on or off campus at UMass. The series gives students of color a chance to hear from lecturers with similar backgrounds to speak on issues that promote the awareness of their surroundings.

50-person task force to review the current campus alcoholic beverage policy and the "wide range of issues related to the use of alcohol by members or our community."

"I think it is an extraordinarily important issue," Pearson said. "All of what we do as a University requires, at a minimum, to ensure the safety and well-being of members of the community. A sensible alcohol policy is an essential part of that."

The task force, which includes approximately 10 student members, began to meet in late October. Subcommittees of the task force are considering issues such as educational programs, counseling, and consumption of alcohol off- campus, at fraternities and sororities, and in dormitory rooms.

"There has been a great deal of discussion about the need for greater educational programs and on-campus weekend programming which does not include alcohol," Pearson said. "We are looking for attractive alternatives and we will make some recommendations about that."

The task force is scheduled to present its recommendations to the Chancellor's Executive Advisory Committee for consideration before Thanksgiving.

State reactions

At the same time that Scott called for a review of the existing alcohol policy at UMass Amherst, the state Board of Higher Education met to discuss a system-wide policy.

Feelings were running high from the media attention to Prentice's death, and James Carlin, chair of the Board, and Stanley Koplick, Chancellor of Higher Education, called for a ban on alcohol at all state schools at the Oct. 14 meeting.

The ban was immediately criticized by Scott and other administrators, faculty, and students, who overwhelmingly opposed the idea in their Oct. 22 referendum vote.

"On a campus this size, any attempts at banning [alcohol] will not be effective," Scott said. "It is just not feasible."

The action that was actually passed by the entire Board of Higher Education, however, did not call for a ban, but for a "re-evaluation and strengthening" of current campus alcohol policies.

The Board asked each campus' Board of Trustees to examine existing alcohol policy and look for ways, including stricter enforcement and increased educational programs, to "eliminate underage consumption of alcoholic beverages and curb binge drinking."

Elly Court, student representative to the Board of Higher Education, said the Board's intention was to emphasize reducing underage drinking.

"This is a recommendation and the focus is on underage drinking," Court said. "I think statewide there's going to have to be a serious investment in educational and counseling services dealing with substance abusers."

Current direction

The Board of Trustees are scheduled to discuss the alcohol policy at their meeting in the first week in December. They are now expected to recommend that each Chancellor be given the authority to draw up a specific policy for each campus, under guidelines established by the Board of Trustees and the President's Office.

Thomas Robinson, Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs, said the Trustees will likely require that each Chancellor ensure the campus' policies are in accordance with all federal, state and local laws, and that programs for education and counseling are put in place on each campus.

"Each Chancellor will need to institute compliance with those laws," Robinson said. "Every campus is different. Within that context, each campus could develop an appropriate policy."

Scott said that he and the Chancellor's Executive Advisory Committee will use the recommendations of the Alcoholic Beverage Task Force in forming a new policy.

"We will work to incorporate the Task Force recommendations into our current policy," Scott said. "Some issues may be able to be adopted immediately, others might need specific Board approval."

The challenge now is to see if the new policies will have a substantial impact on student behavior.

Scott said he is hopeful that they will.

"Yes, I am optimistic. There is a lot of experience on the task force and we have pretty good policy already in place," Scott said. "One issue is better enforcement of our current policies."

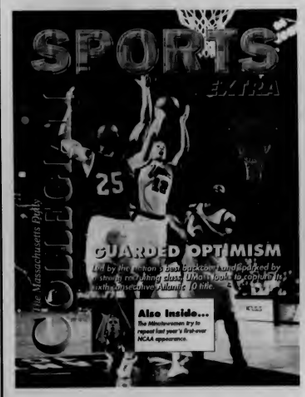
the first time they experience what it is like to not smoke for a day," she added.

Gillett and other Health educators made bulletin board kits for all Resident Assistants. Each kit contains information on relaxation techniques, tips on how to quit and how to support a friend, as well as the top 10 lies about the tobacco industry.

"People need to know there are more ways to quit smoking than quitting cold turkey," Gillett said.

In a press release issued by the American Cancer Society (ACS) how-to-quit tips were offered.

Some of these tips were: throw out all cigarettes matches and lighters, clean out ashtrays, hold a pen or a pencil, chew gum or carrots, drink plenty of water and juices and avoid caffinated liquids which causes the desire for nicotine.



In addition to these tips the ACS also offered tips to those trying to help someone to quit; keep in close contact with the person via phone or in person, help them keep a good sense of humor by telling jokes, watching a funny movie or going to a comedy club, agree to give up something that you are addicted to such as chocolate or coffee; prepare a survival kit full of carrot, celery, sugarless gum, straws and candy.

Besides this weeks sponsored events, UHS also holds a "Kick Butts" support group every Wednesday in the Campus Center room 801 from 7–8 p.m.

A different point of view

Doug Clinton

Is the American judicial system really nothing more than a farce perpetrated and perpetuated by a nation of misguided individuals? I don't think so, but many people in Great Britain seem to think so.

Last Wednesday, a Cambridge jury convicted British au pair Louise Woodward of second-degree murder. Monday morning, Judge Hiller B. Zobel reduced the sentence to manslaughter.

Monday morning, at about 10 a.m., I innocently turned on CNN and was instantly assaulted by a barrage of media activity. The news of Judge Zobel's decision was impending, and on both sides of the Atlantic, people awaited his decision in a state of pants-wetting anticipation.

With the decision came the obligatory reactions from the press, the people and the experts. Because the press and the experts, while informative, ultimately prove boring, the news media needs to rely upon a slew of "just plain folks" to provide the real excitement in a story. In this case, they turned to the patrons of a pub in Elton, England.

Throughout the trial, I had been privy to the reactions of outraged Britons bemoaning the fate of their country-woman as she was heartlessly persecuted by the big, bad American judicial machine. As such, I was not surprised when I saw that CNN had deployed a dependable, tough cookie of a reporter to field real, human reactions in the aforementioned pub.

Despite the fact that a general spokesperson was supposed to make a statement for the people, our heroine didn't have any trouble finding two people ready, willing and able to vent their anger and frustration over the plight of their country-woman to viewers all over the globe.

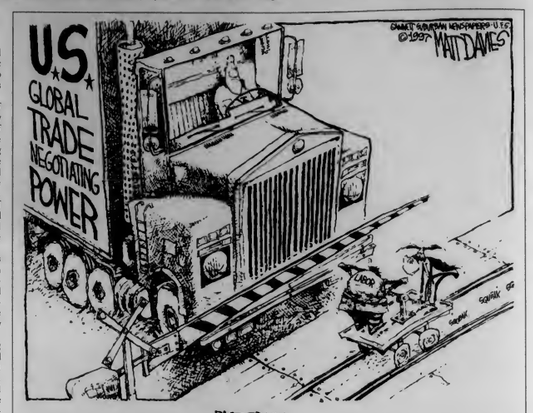
Throughout the case, I was struck by the loyalty Louise Woodward's fellow Britons had showed the embattled au pair, but even as I watched them urging Louise to be strong, something about their loyalty proved to be somewhat stomach-churning. What do these people really have in common with Louise Woodward other than citizenship?

Had she done anything to distinguish herself prior to killing Matthew Eappen? How cruel we all were! Not only is O.J. Simpson an American citizen, but he was able to parlay a football career into successful stints in both broadcasting and acting. Where was the national solidarity behind O.J.? Did Louise Woodward ever do anything nearly as endearing as portraying Leslie Nielson's delightfully wacky and accident-prone sidekick?

What I think it all boils down to is that the British in general, think that all Americans are, in general, stupid. And I think that sentiment would appear to extend to our judicial system.

What brought me to this conclusion was the fact that whenever one of Louise Woodward's British supporters was asked to comment on the proceedings, their arguments were always emotional, never based on the actual facts of the case. They thought she was innocent because, to the British psyche, a nice young English girl could never do something so base and evil.

The facts of the case are thrown out. In the minds of many Britons, the case is no longer about a dead infant, but about a judicial system so out of whack that they would dare to accuse a nice English girl of such a heinous crime. The case is no longer about emotionally shattered and grieving parents, but about a sadistic judicial system that exists solely to persecute poor, innocent English girls in a brutal and public manner.



Now, I'm not debating the facts of the case, whether or not she's guilty of murder, manslaughter or merely of being in the wrong place at the wrong time. While the state is trying to ensure that justice is served, the British people condemn our judicial system because, heaven forbid, we chose to prosecute one of their own. While there is a certain measure of animosity between Americans and the British; generally speaking, we all go home friends at the end of the day.

So why the sudden loss of trust? Is it so unreasonable to think that a British teenager could have committed such a crime in the United States? Certainly, the British probably think that American teenagers are capable of much worse, and they would be right.

Matthew Eappen is dead, nothing can change that. Louise Woodward may bear the responsibility for that death. Perhaps she isn't guilty. Perhaps the child would have died even if Louise had never crossed the Atlantic. But why is it so inconceivable to so many that Louise Woodward is responsible? What I'm really asking here is this: Do the British really have so little respect for our country and our judicial system? Is it possible to accuse one individual without incurring the wrath of an entire country?

It would be a shame if a case that should be about the death of an 8-month-old infant is remembered only because of the anger the British people felt when America had the audacity to accuse one of their own of nothing short of murder.

"Welcome to the University of Massachusetts touch tone registration system. We are now accepting pre-registration requests for Spring 1998. Please enter your nine digit student ID."

If this recording doesn't make you cringe, I'd be hard pressed to find something that does. And yet, besides the fact that we're warned in advance that these are merely "requests" and the likelihood that we'll get everything we want is null; I can't help but get a little weepy-eyed as I enter my branch code and four-digit personal ID.

Karen Sonnewald

This is my last pre-registration.

I'm among the ranks of the graduating class of 1998. I've been through numerous pre-registrations and numerous add/drops. I've felt the sting of rejection — "Your request cannot be processed. The section you requested is over-enrolled" — as well as the elation of victory — "You have added HRTA 100. Section one." I've spent hours on the phone entering random six-digit schedule numbers with the hopes of adding something, anything. "You have added," dramatic pause, "Biochemistry 496."

Um... no.

So I've spent just as much time frantically flipping through the course book, armed with my action code, to drop the unintentionals. But all that doesn't come until February. We can find some solace in not knowing which classes we won't get. And they are bound to be a few. Ignorant bliss, perhaps?

But pre-registration has a whole other gamut of problems. Pin numbers. Why do I get mine in the mail? Why do some people have to see their advisors? Regardless, you've got to love the handy, easy-to-follow guide entitled "How do I find my academic dean?" (see page 11, pre-reg guide). It runs something like this. If my major is... (locate your major on the page), I should go to... (trace your finger down until you come across a building and room number). My major is Journalism, so if need be, I report to the Arts and Sciences Advising Center, E24 Machmer Hall. But here's a little hint. If you need that page to send you in the right direction, don't even bother to pre-register. You shouldn't be in college anyway.

And then there's the stress of not having a major at all. Freshmen and sophomores need not worry... yet. But juniors? And seniors, God forbid. By the time fourth year roles around you usually settle for anything because panic sets in. Impulse decision. You declare a major so that you can take classes in that department. But until you see that dean (page 11 again), get signed in, and deliver the canary, gold and goldenrod copies to the appropriate destinations, you're out-of-luck. (Which one is goldenrod, anyway?) Even in your major there's a matter of what to take. At this time of year this becomes a common topic of conversation. We all exchange information on our blow-off classes as well as updates on reformed blow-offs (that info is essential). Some people pore over course guides, talk to professors, plan out their entire schedules on those dandy grids. Gotta love 'em. But I'm not that ambitious. People like me, well, I tend to register for any 12 credits now, only to suffer during add/drop as I approach every professor with the same tired story: I'm a senior and I need this class to graduate. Oh, but not this time, because I only need six credits to graduate. I've been introduced to the fine world of senior billing and I really can register for absolutely anything. I have successfully completed all the requirements for my major and my minor. My gen-eds are history (Did I take a history?) Six credits, the last two classes of my college career. But as I enter the six-digit schedule number I'm requesting, I'll try not to get too choked up.

Because, chances are, I won't get those classes anyway.

Peace or pieces?

While reading the Collegian the other day, my eyes ran into the coverage of the Hillel House memorial for Yitzhak Rabin, the late Israeli Prime Minister, who was assassinated in 1995 by a Jewish fanatic.

However, the coverage had some strange points that aroused my attention and also raised some questions. The coverage says that students who held the memorial (35 participants it said) are not/don't represent "the students of UMass." This is what the coverage reveals later. I'm not against the memorial; I'm against the false language used in reporting.

This is no the point. One of the participants, the report says, spoke about how Rabin's murder was "a defining point in her life and the lives of the audience." Well, what audience? The Israelis? The Zionists? Or the Jews? Or the UMass students? But again, this is not the point.

The point is peace in the Middle East. Rabin was/is a hero for many Israelis. That's fine though it's quite hard, for me at least, to forgive or forget his past against the Palestinians and the Arabs. Yet, his positive steps toward the road of peace can hardly be denied by anybody. Unfortunately, these great steps toward peace are now intentionally ruined by the Israeli Prime Minister. After two long years of Rabin's death and after almost a year and a half of Netanyahu's coming to power, no step forward has been taken simply because the Israeli government still has "many promises and peace agreements to break."

I was touched by the participants' words and dreams about peace. But, the question is: do the participants believe in peace as it should be; giving the Palestinians their occupied land and their right to have their state? I really wonder if my colleagues of the Hillel House were having their concept of a just and comprehensive peace in their minds while they were having this memorial. Any true desire for change must be equipped with both hope and anger. It's quite easy to have hope but it's quite difficult to work for change equipped with anger and nourished by self-criticism.

It's time to abandon your wild Zionist dreams and, as a rising, you should do the best of your effort to make peace become a shining reality in the Middle East. The birds of peace, which are left no chance to live as Mr. Netanyahu can't afford to see them around, need your efforts so that they can survive. Let peace for the Israelis and the Palestinians as well prevail. The state of Israel can be safe when the Palestinians restore their denied land and have their denied land and have their state, the state of Palestine.

A response to Goodall

To the Editor:

In Uzzell v. Friday, the Federal district court of North Carolina ruled that the University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill could not set racial quotas on the composition of the Student Senate. Their decision was based on Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the same act upon which the Supreme Court upheld the affirmative action in Regents of the University of California V. Bakke.

The case Mr. Goodall has stated has nothing to do with this, since the issue of electoral districts is not the actual cause for the debate. The ALANA caucus is not an electoral district, it is a coalition of interest groups that has been granted special recognition above all other groups. This is illegal.

I ask Mr. Goodall to read the opinion in Uzzell V. Friday and see how the Court addresses the issue of whether ALANA appointed representatives have to be ALANA students. The Court says that the law applies even if the quotas are inferred, meaning that the appointments are given to groups with a bias, no matter who they choose as their senators.

This legal theory is actually not "half-understood... downright twisted." It is crystal clear. I ask Mr. Goodall not to refer to legal theory he has not even read. I assume he did not read the opinion of the Court, as he asks in the beginning of his letter for the title of the case.

The legal arguments for this case are extremely strong, with more than adequate precedent to back them up. Now, with the Senate clearly breaking the law, how can we senators expect the resolutions we pass to be respected. And furthermore, how can we call this government legitimate?

Don't give up on family love

To the Editor:

This letter is in response to Ron Lenker's article "UMass 'Pride' Alliance not living up to its title" that appeared in the Collegian on Nov. 13. Ron said, "They [parents] will get over it and if they don't, why would you want someone in your life who doesn't really get over it and love you? Do you really want to have parents that are in love with what they think are you? (Well, maybe, if they are paying for your tuition.)"

I totally agree that if you tell a friend about it, and they don't want to be your friend, then they are not worth having as a friend. But families are another story.

I recently told my parents that I had a girlfriend. Since I have shared that part of my life, I haven't really spoken to my parents. The only things that they can say to me is how abnormal I am. They have forbidden my sister to visit me up at school, and due to the unacceptance of all this, my girlfriend and I have broken up.

I am almost 21-years-old, and for my entire life (up until I told them) I have had 100 percent of their love. It is crazy for Ron to just say deal with it and who needs them anyway. I am happy to hear that his mother treats him no differently now, but that is not the case for many. No one should give up on the love from their families. And it is not about having parents supporting you as far as tuition goes. It's much more than that. It's about emotional support and having your parents love you no matter who you are.

It doesn't matter who you are, or who you fall in love with. I am just a normal girl who happened to fall in love with a girl. My parents don't understand this, but that is not enough for me to throw away my entire life with them. I can not forget about my parents or my girlfriend; I can not give up on love from any of them. It is not so easy to say they are not worth it, because they are.

Boogie Nights explores the "dirty world" of adult filmmaking

BOOGIE NIGHTS
Directed by Paul Thomas Anderson with Mark Wallberg, Julianne Moore, Burt Reynolds
Playing at Hampshire Six Theater

Boogie Nights is one of those films that attempts to satirize the movie industry. Like its predecessors, which include Sunset Boulevard, Ed Wood, The Player, Swimming with Sharks and many others, this is a movie about making movies and even more importantly about being a movie star.

A movie star is a term with numerous connotations, and Boogie Nights tries to dig deep into what it all really means to be big, powerful and famous. However, Anderson's sophomore gig is an unusual film about very unusual movies. Boogie Nights takes place on the other side of the tracks from the the glamorous, glorious world of Hollywood land, and being a star in this realm doesn't neccessarily mean you have to have Tom Cruise's eyes or Julia Roberts' smile; in Dirk Diggler's case, you just need to be very well endowed.

Boogie Nights follows a what-goes-up-must-come-crashing-back-down mentality focusing on the life of a pornographic film icon, Dirk Diggler (Mark Walberg). At the story's beginning, which takes place in the height of the 70s disco inferno, Diggler (that wasn't his original name, he later changed it when he started making films) is barely a teenager, but nonetheless is facinated with becoming a star. Anderson captures his frustrations and his relentless yearning to make something out of his life. Diggler stares wild eyed into his mirror envisioning a day when he has overcome the traumas of his bored suburban life equipped with ruthlessly domineering parents in a world where escape appears uobtainable.

Eventually Diggler meets porn director extraordinaire Jack Horner, played by Burt Reynolds in his best role since Deliverence,who woes him into joining his bizzare cast of stuggling misfits who seemed to given up hope at Hollywood stardom. In exchange for their hopeless dreams, they surround themselves around Horner forcing to find contentness by settling for acting roles in pornos.

Anderson's best work is here as he introduces the naive young Diggler to Horner's crew allowing him to be swallowed up in this dirty world of adult filmmaking. All the while, Anderson expresses the camradery that these characters share, after all they are all in the same boat, just wanting to be stars in a world that forces us all to strive

SCI-FI LULLABIES
The London Suede
Nude/Columbia

English popsters, the London Suede, have recently released Sci-Fi Lullabies — a collection of b-sides spanning their entire career.

Without question, The London Suede (known simply as Suede to the rest of the world) kick-started the Britpop revolution of the early '90s. Before their first single was even released, the UK weekly music press had anointed them as the "Best New Band in Britain" and their self-titled debut instantly became the fastest selling debut in UK history. So much for taking the scenic route to the top.

Since their inception in 1989 (back when current Elastica front-woman Justine Frischmann was a member), The London Suede have, over the course of three studio albums and more than a dozen singles, amassed an impressive catalog of glam-infused pop songs dealing with quintessentially British themes.

They have also accumulated a couple dozen primo quality b-sides which have been criminally withheld from American ears — until now. Sci-Fi Lullabies (Nude/Columbia) is a marvelous collection of 27 of these "lost songs" sprawled over two discs which subtly chronicle the evolution of a band that many in America have never even heard of, but certainly should.

Unfortunately, their perceived upper-crusty, Anglophilic focus — whether justified or not — has proved to create insurmountable odds in their quest to make significant inroads here. So much in fact that while all of their albums have sold well into the millions over the globe, The London Suede have barely elicited a blip on the rock Richter scale here in the States. 1994's Dog Man Star sold a paltry 28,000 copies despite a heap of positive press clippings.

After the exceptionally gifted guitarist/songwriter Bernard Butler left, many wrote the band off for good, including long-time fans and those in the notoriously fickle music press. It didn't help matters when front-man Brett Anderson recruited a then unknown 17-year-old amateur, Richard Oakes, to be Butler's replacement on guitar.

After taking some time off to regroup, The London Suede returned with their strongest album yet, the brilliant Coming Up. More simplistically, it does just fine without the grand, sweeping gesticulations that permeated The London Suede and Dog Man Star.

A major hit throughout Europe, Canada and Asia, Coming Up wasn't released here until this past spring, where it garnered almost uniformly positive reviews but was met with commercial indifference. What was also amazing about Coming Up was the plethora of good material from those sessions that didn't make it on to the final 10-track album.

The entire second disc of Sci-Fi Lullabies is devoted to these b-sides, and the hauntingly beautiful "Europe Is Our Playground" (from the "Trash" single) closes the first disc on a quietly powerful note.

Even still, Sci-Fi Lullabies is not entirely comprehensive, doing away with a few of their more self-masturbatory numbers — the silly "Digging A Hole" among them. With such a prosperity of quality songs to choose from, trimming the fat was clearly a wise move.

The first disc is littered with standout songs, including the live staple "My Insatiable One," a for fame. When their dreams are shattered, they find refuge anyway they can and that's where Horner fits in, there's a lot of money in adult enertainment, and Horner will exploite it any way he can.

Throughout the '80s, Diggler climbs the ranks of the adult filmmaking world winning awards and turning profits, and eventually his ego catches up with him. As brilliant as the first hour of Boogie Nights is, the remaining hour and a half loses focus in its pursuit of chronicling Diggler's transition away from the innocent broken youth and concentrates on the monster that he has evolved into. Anderson also runs away in tangets with several sub-plots, that although feature interesting situations and characters, they are still randomly juggled about within the narrative. Points in the film stray far to away from Diggler and Horner picking up on the stories of secondary characters far too late in the game. As concentrated as the first half of the film was the conclusion, still quite well made, lacks focus and forces the film to be much longer in duration than neccessary.

After the extremely disappointing Lost World, Julianne Moore returns to the world of semi-indepen- dent film in the best role of her career. She plays the illustrious porn goddess Amber Waves, a dissatisfied human being who turns her personal negativity into the hope she shares with others, especially Diggler. She takes on the role of Diggler's mother figure (which is a bit unnerving considering they have sex on camera) yet she transcends the purity of innocence trapped in a bitter, sleazy world. Through her, Anderson creates the truely unsettling aspects of his film, where sex and sexuality find an uncomfortable middle ground. These concepts are far from desensitized yet somehow manage to be played out with a sense of humor and a naive innocence that is shocking in how natural it all appears (I won't go into specifics, given the nature of the subject matter at hand).

Boogie Nights could have been one of the greatest character studies about the idea of stardom. Its nostalgia works well but is often difficult to digest as it struggles to capture every essence of '70s and '80s sub-culture in a movie that's already far too long. One of the most memorable scenes is a debate that Horner has with a big shot producer over switching from film to video. "I'm a filmmaker" he shouts and at this point we see the real focus of Boogie Nights. Once again this is a film about making films and when it loses that direction, Boogie Nights fails to make the statements it so wants to make. However, this is still a fascinating work from a truely talented director and an excellent cast. It captures a world we are all intrigued by, but just don't understand. Boogie Nights sets out to help us understand, and even justify our fascinations with wanting to be a star. B glammy ode to gender- bending lust and the fuzz-drenched guitar anthem "Killing Of A Flash Boy." But it's the emotive splendor of "My Dark Star" that is the true jewel of this compendium. Previously released on the now out-of-print Stay Together EP, this grand opus spotlights Butler's trademark rolling guitar riffs set against an elegant keyboard silhouette.

For the uninitiated, now's your chance to "discover" The London Suede. Those who have already been indoctrinated, consider Sci-Fi Lullabies a fruitious mining expedition for lost gems. A

Shaq, Lakers jump out with early start, 8–0

By Beth Harris
Associated Press

INGLEWOOD, Calif. — The Los Angeles Lakers haven't been this good since Magic Johnson startled basketball with his first retirement in November 1991.

The only NBA team besides Atlanta (10-0) without a loss this season, Los Angeles tied the record for the best start in franchise history at 8-0 with a 121-95 rout of the Vancouver Grizzlies on Sunday.

"Everybody's loving it," guard Nick Van Exel said. "The main thing is we just got to keep it up, can't have any letdowns, got to keep playing the same way."

A bit of history awaits Tuesday at Utah, where the Lakers could surpass the 1987-88 team with their ninth consecutive win. That club wasn't exactly shabby. Led by Kareem Abdul-Jabbar and James Worthy, the Lakers of 10 years ago won 62 games and the NBA championship for their fifth and final title of the 1980s. "It's a lot of pride right now," Van Exel said. "We want to try and go undefeated as long as we can."

The Lakers' streak — longest at any time since February 1996 and the best mark since Del Harris became coach four years ago — includes wins over Utah, New York, Dallas, San Antonio and Houston. They became the first NBA team in nearly five years to sweep the "Texas Triangle."

"It looked like it was going to be a pretty tough first month," Harris said. "We're halfway through and have managed to beat some pretty good teams and to put away the teams that were not as high up in the standings."

Van Exel was as perfect against Vancouver as the Lakers' unblemished record. He went 9-for-9 from the field and hit all six of his 3-point shots for 24 points.

"I had to cool off," he said after his final 3-pointer gave the Lakers a 34-point lead in the third quarter. "I have to save some of it for Utah. I don't want to waste all of it."

Los Angeles has lost five straight regular-season games in Salt Lake City, where the Lakers' last win came in December 1994. "When we take the floor to warm up, every Utah fan will be in his seat. There will no late arrivals. The place will be rocking," Harris said.

"That was one thing that helped us so much in San Antonio and Houston. We were able to draw off the energy of the crowds there because it's full and they're ready for a game. These people (Jazz fans) are ready for a game and it should be high energy." The Lakers opened the season with a 104-87 win over the Jazz at the Forum nearly three weeks ago. But O'Neal and Campbell missed the game with injuries.

Water polo takes ECAC Tourney 3-1

By Jim Ehringham
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's water polo team, absent from the NCAA tournament for the first time in five years, at least had an opportunity to end 1997 on a positive note. The Minutemen won the Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference Tournament this past weekend, posting a 3-1 record in the double elimination competition.

UMASS	9
GW	8

UMass, finishing the season at 26–10 (7–2 Collegiate Water Polo Association), took home the ECAC title with a 9–6 decision over George Washington.

Saturday's opening round saw the Minutemen rout Villanova, 16–5. Junior All-East first teamer Brian Stahl netted a team high three goals and freshman goalkeeper J.R. Vander Wall notched 19 saves in a rare start (first stringer Richard Huntley did not make the trip). Later on in the day, UMass fell to George Washington, 9–8, in an overtime thriller. Sunday brought host Brown in a semifinal battle. The Minutemen proved to be poor guests, defeating the Bears 12–8.

The title game, a rematch against GW, was a tough, defensive contest through the first half. Then, in the third period, UMass netted four scores, gave up none, and never looked back. Junior Aldo Roman, who registered seven goals on the weekend as well as stellar defensive play, was named tournament MVP.

"The ECAC is the largest conference in the country, as far as member schools go," UMass coach Russ Yarworth said. The tournament was sponsored by the U.S. Olympic Committee as part of a program to nurture developing sports. For Yarworth, it was an opportunity to take stock of next season's squad — all fourteen players who made the trip played in every game.

"We didn't go down there [saying] 'we've got to work hard and win,'" Yarworth said. "Before each game I told the guys I have three requests. One, is to play hard; two is to enjoy it; and three is to have positive interactions between each other and the officials. By and large we accomplished that."

But despite those accomplished goals and the ECAC title, Yarworth and his squad will remember this season for the CWPA Eastern Conference title game against Queens, when the royals registered the game winning goal with just two seconds left. But out of pain comes hunger.

"My summation of the seasons comes down to two seconds," Yarworth said. "All the hard work was lost with two seconds. It's no one's fault... we've got to work hundreds of hours to overcome those two seconds."

ty. With just over 11 minutes to play, senior co- captain Brad Norton picked off a pass at Lowell's blue line and fired a shot that sailed over Fillion and ricocheted off the plexiglass in front of the net where freshman Nick Stephens pounced on it, knotting the game at 4–4.

Nicholishen provided the game-winner for Lowell in overtime.

UMass rebounded with a convincing win against the Skating Dutchmen of Union College, 4–1, at Achilles Rink in Schnectady, N.Y. on Saturday.

win.

In a match that took just over an hour to complete, sophomore outside hitter Kari Hogancamp paced the Minutewomen with 10 kills, 11 digs, and an impressive .438 attack percentage. As a team, UMass hit a stellar .374, taking advantage of a porous Fordham defense.

Here's the situation.

UMass is in a fifth place tie with Xavier. GW, Duquesne, and Virginia Tech are a game ahead of the duo with a 9–9 conference record.

For UMass to be packing their bags for Dayton University (the site of the tournament) come Sunday, the Colonials would have to lose both matches (vs. Xavier, vs. Dayton), Duquesne would have to beat Virginia Tech, but lose to St Bonaventure (1–17 in the A–10). The Minutewomen would have to win both their home dates this weekend when they take on Temple (first place 18–0 in the conference) and LaSalle.

"The odds aren't with us, but it could happen. I've seen stranger things happen," Kenny said.

Friday's match versus Temple is set for a 7 p.m. start. When the two teams squared off in Philly in late October, Temple took the match in four sets.

Duke tops AP, Illinois St lands 24th b–ball rank

NORMAL, Ill. (AP) — Excitement is building at Illinois State, ranked No. 24 in Yesterday's AP college basketball poll, its first appearance on the list since 1983.

The Redbirds climbed into the rankings after a 101-66 win Sunday over Oakland (Michigan) in the season opener.

"We're very excited about that and we hope it's a good barometer for the progress our program has made," said coach Kevin Stallings, one of college basketball's hot, young coaches. But the Redbirds have their work cut out for them against Wisconsin tonight, especially playing without the services of two starters and a key reserve.

"It will be significantly more difficult," Stallings said yesterday. But he spoke of his team's "good bench, with all 14 of these guys back from last year and they really understand the necessity of being able to fill in."

Illinois State replaced Texas, which lost two games in the Coaches vs. Cancer Classic, and fell from its No. 22 preseason ranking.

The Redbirds last appeared in the rankings in February 1985. They were ranked for three weeks that season, reaching as high as No. 16.

Elsewhere in the poll, the five leaders were unchanged from the preseason.

Arizona, Kansas, Duke, North Carolina and Clemson again led the balloting, in that order. The defending national champion Wildcats kept their 30 first-place votes and had 1,685 points, 16 more than Kansas — which had 28 No. 1 votes.

Duke had seven No. 1 votes — a loss of one — but still two more than North Carolina, which picked up that first-place vote. South Carolina climbed to sixth place, switching places with UCLA, after beating Maryland. Purdue moved to eighth with its defeat last week of Long Island University — exchanging spots with Kentucky.

Xavier, which has yet to play, rounded out the Top Ten. New Mexico, Connecticut and Fresno State again ranked 11 through 13.

Iowa switched places with Stanford after demolishing a pair of opponents last week while Utah, North Carolina Charlotte, Temple, Oklahoma and Rhode Island rounded out the Top 20. Mississippi, Louisville, Indiana, Illinois State and Georgia filled out the rankings.

Temple, which beat Indiana on Friday, had the biggest jump from the preseason poll, moving from 24th to 18th. That loss dropped the Hoosiers from No. 17 to 23rd, the same distance Georgia fell to No. 25 after splitting two games in the Coaches vs. Cancer Classic.

■ NBA

and the NBA in scoring. The multi-million dollar man has played just five games this season, due to "injuries," yet he is back averaging a trite 27.8 points per game.

Might I add, as a brief side note, right behind him in NBA scoring leaders is The Admiral and first half of the twin towers... David Robinson. Tim Duncan's partner in crime is averaging 26.4 points per game.

Last year's oh-so-deserving NBA Most Valuable Player, the Mailman, is certainly delivering on the floor this year. Karl Malone is averaging 23.1 ppg, definitely an MVP.

Oh, and where is his "Airness," in the rankings? I stand corrected. The $33 million man is ranked third with an average of 24.8 points per game. Michael Jordan is being closely hunted down by my New Jersey Nets' Sam Cassell with 24.0 ppg.

MJ. Is definitely worth the money he is getting paid, don't you think?

Especially when the Bulls are holding fourth place when the Milwaukee Bucks, revamped Charlotte Hornets and undefeated Hawks own better records. For gosh sakes, the defending champs are ranked 13th in the NBA with a 6–4 record and a .600 winning percentage.

Maybe that's the reason why the Bulls are looking to other means to obtain a win and become the team they used to be. Going along with the trend of no-name players, the Bulls have recently signed former Wake Forest guard Rusty LaRue. In college LaRue was a two-sport standout, playing both basketball and football. It's now time to look for a turn around.

Last Saturday the Bulls took on Shawn Kemp and his Cleveland Cavs. Da Bulls squeaked out a win by nine points. The final was a defensive showing of 79–70. The Big Thunder from Down Under Luc Longley, and Jordan were the only two players from Chicago to score in double digits.

Anyway, back to the Lakers. Shaquille O'Neal, Kobe Bryant, Nick Van Exel, and Eddie Jones make one heck of a team. The Lakers have now matched the best record in franchise history. Winning their eighth straight last Sunday, L.A. is now 8–0 on the season.

The Lakers are now the only other undefeated team other than the Atlanta Hawks. On Sunday, L.A. crushed the "challenging" Vancouver Grizzlies by a impressive score of 121 to 95. Eddie Jones scored 28 points on the night and Nick Van Exel posted 24 points. At the half the California powerhouse was up 21 points on the Grizzlies.

In closing thoughts, how about Cassell and his New Jersey Nets? The new team is armed with hot new players and a hot new logo. The Meadowlands is now actually selling more than 1,000 tickets per game.

The Nets are now in second place. That's right. I said second place! With a record of 5–3, New Jersey is behind only the Miami Heat and New York Knicks, both tied for first with 6–3 records. As soon as New Jersey gets to play that extra game, they will be holding the first position in the Atlantic Division once again.

Hockey loses 5-4 thriller against Lowell

By Corey Peter Goodman
Collegian Staff

Since the start of the 1997 season, success has been just inches out of the Massachusetts hockey team's reach.

Despite competitive efforts against Boston University, Boston College and UMass–Lowell earlier in the season, UMass emerged winless. In fact, heading into Friday night's tilt against Lowell, UMass had only one win in five tries — an out–of–conference victory at Nebraska–Omaha.

UMass-Lowell	5
UMass-Amherst	4

This weekend, UMass played five strong periods. But it wasn't good enough to earn them a sweep of the weekend series with UMass–Lowell and Union College. Friday night, UMass fell to Lowell, 5–4, before crushing Union, 4–1, on Saturday evening.

Friday's game against Lowell was delayed 75 minutes while the season's first Nor'easter terrorized Massachusetts. The Minutemen appeared to wait an additional 20 minutes before showing up, letting Lowell control the first period tempo.

However, UMass rallied from a three–goal deficit in the late stages of the second period and in the first half of the third period to force an overtime session. Just 32.8 seconds from a tie, Lowell senior captain Mike Nicholishen fired a shot at UMass goaltender Brian Regan that deflected off a crowd in front and trickled into the net for the game–winner.

"We showed a lot of guts and pride at home," Massachusetts coach Joe Mallen said. "But we can't afford to give up that many shots and expect to win."

Regan faced 37 River Hawk shots on the evening, 14 of which came during an all–out barrage by Lowell in the first period. UMass mustered only 2 shots on Lowell netminder Martin Fillion in the period, and 23 in the game.

Minutes after freshman Kris Wallis pulled UMass to within a goal at 2–1 midway through the second period, Lowell responded with two quick tallies within a minute of each other.

A dejected Minutemen group, trailing 4–1 with under a minute to play in the second period, was rejuvenated by the effort of two freshmen. Wallis — seeing extended time with senior Dan Juden injured — rushed over Lowell's blue line, circled around the net before finding fellow freshman Matt Smith at the blue line. The defenseman moved in on Fillion and fired the puck between his legs. UMass trailed Lowell 4–2 heading into the third period.

Massachusetts coach Joe Mallen realized that the third period would be a crucial one towards the team's future. He told his team to "keep the play simple."

"Just get one goal back at a time," Mallen said.

An energized Minuteman team took the ice during the final period. Keeping the puck in Lowell's zone and becoming the aggressor, UMass created a handful of opportunities in the first few seconds.

With over a minute gone by, senior co–captain Tim Lovell took a pass from senior defenseman Mike Gaffney just short of center ice. Lovell moved over the blue line, faked a shot and sent a Lowell defender sliding, then moved in closer and fired a wrist shot just over Fillion's glove into the top corner of the net.

The goal electrified the Mullins Center crowd of 1,756. Trailing 4–3 and scrapping for an equalizer, Lovell was hacked from behind by a Lowell defender. The player's stick damaged his shoulder and caught him in the mouth as Lovell skated slowly to the bench for repairs.

Angered by the no–call, UMass once again stepped up the intensi-

Hawks hit streak; MJ and the Bulls struggle for win

Yeah, yeah, yeah, the undefeated Atlanta Hawks, what else is new? Coming off of an exhilarating 88–83 win over those challenging Los Angeles Clippers, the Hawks extended their undefeated tenure to 10–0 last Sunday.

With this win, the Hawks continue to hold the NBA's best record. Led by Dikembe Mutombo, Atlanta is now just five wins short of the league record of 15 straight wins to start a season. I send my sincere congrats to the most deserving Lenny Wilkens.

But the Hawks, 10–0? Why the Hawks? What ever happened to the dynasty in Chicago? Or my New Jersey powerhouse? Or better yet, the blues and funk out of Utah?

The Hawks roster doesn't even consist of "big" names. The majority of the team is has–beens and wanna–bes, with the exception of the recruited Mutombo, that is. Names like Smith, Corbin, Gray, Henderson, Brown, and Livingston are the bulk of the roster. One question... who are these people?

Then there are the two older, more experienced, also known as burnt–out guys: Mookie Blaylock and Christian Laettner.

I guarantee the Atlanta Hawks will not break or even come close to breaking the NBA record of 15 straight wins to start a season. I think they better just enjoy being the best team in the East... for now.

Please feel free to quote me on that.

Anyway, enough about the unbeaten, unchallenged Hawks. How about those "equally emphasized and equally noted" undefeated L.A. Lakers?

Shaquille O'Neal and his Lakers are the hottest thing in the West. Kazaam is leading both the Lakers

UMass' Donaghue falls as XCC takes 10th in District I Qualifier

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

Two Saturdays ago, at Bull Run Park in Centerville, Va., the Massachusetts women's cross country team dealt with pouring rain as they fought their way to their third consecutive Atlantic 10 Championship. One would think that the weather could only get better when the team traveled to Franklin Park in Boston for the NCAA District I Qualifier, as a rain storm is considered one of the worst omens on a cross country meet.

Sadly, mother nature had worse in mind when the Minutewomen took the course in Boston, as the one thing possibly worse than a rain storm, a snow storm, swept over Massachusetts.

"The course conditions were not great," UMass coach Julie LaFreniere said. "I guess you could describe the race by saying we were running on cold, wet, mashed potatoes."

UMass, expecting perhaps a fifth to seventh place overall, pulled in tenth in the qualifying meet. The main disappointment came when two–time A–10 individual champion and number one runner Rebecca Donaghue took a tumble late in the race.

"Rebecca Donaghue had been running in the top five all race long," A–10 coach of the year LaFreniere said, "and then she fell, and basically didn't finish the race. That really hurt the team. She tried to get up and continue, but she couldn't feel her feet because they were so cold and numb."

When Donaghue, the team leader, fell out, the remaining Minutewomen took on the added responsibility. Seniors Christy Martin and Katie Greenia led the charge, placing 32nd and 33rd respectively with times of 19:29 and 19:30.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Sharon Tillotson

"It hurts to have your number one runner go down, but the team stayed together well," LaFreniere said.

"Katie Greenia had one of the better races of the season. I was impressed with her finish. Her problem had been the last 1000 meters. She had been tightening up, but this time, she stayed nice and loose."

But, the team could not overcome the loss of Donaghue, a possible Olympic hopeful. Under ideal circumstances, the senior co–captain probably would have placed in the top five and advanced to the National Championships in Greenville, N.C.

"This is not a course for the finesse type runners," LaFreniere said, "and I would say Rebecca and Christy are that type of runner."

The weekend's weather made for a disappointing meet, but with the indoor track season coming up, the Minutewomen look to capture another A–10 Championship, and take one more shot at the NCAA Championships.

V-ball prepares for tournament

And down the stretch they come...

Three horses neck and neck. Two horses only a volleyball's length behind. In what has been a very exhilarating 1997–98 edition of Atlantic 10 volleyball, the final weekend will decide everything.

The Massachusetts volleyball squad finds itself hoping and praying for the near impossible to occur, vaulting them into the conference tournament over Thanksgiving weekend.

With a 1–1 record this past weekend against George Washington and Fordham, the Minutewomen can no longer control their own destiny. It looks as though the fourth and final playoff spot in the tourney will have been decided by a matter of points.

Fordham	0

On Sunday afternoon, UMass (13–16, 8–10 in the A–10) and GW went at it, going kill for kill, point for point. Finally, it was the Colonials who came out on top, handing the Minutewomen a disappointing 15–6, 5–15, 15–12, 5–15, 13–15 loss.

"The match was very well–contested' " coach Bonnie Kenny said. "Both teams played very well, but in the end, we just got beat."

Senior outside hitter Lesley Nolan was a highlight reel special, coming up big in the loss while collecting 18 kills and 22 digs. Sophomore middle blocker Jill Meyers continued another banner year, picking up her 15th double–double on the season with 17 kills and 11 digs.

"Lesley played incredible volleyball this weekend. She played like a senior, playing well defensively and at the net," Kenny said.

On Saturday, the future had never shown so brightly. UMass handled the Rams of Fordham very easily to split the season series with a 15–4, 15–7, 15–7

Swimming and diving splashed, injuries plague UMass squad

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

University Health Services is probably starting to get tired of seeing members of the Massachusetts women's swimming and diving team in the office.

The Minutewomen suffered their second loss of the season on Saturday afternoon, falling to Boston University 182–117, primarily due to the fact that University of Massachusetts has been stricken with the flu bug. Several swimmers were either out of commission or less than 100 percent for the loss to the Terriers. With the defeat, UMass now stands at 2–2.

BU	182
UMASS	117

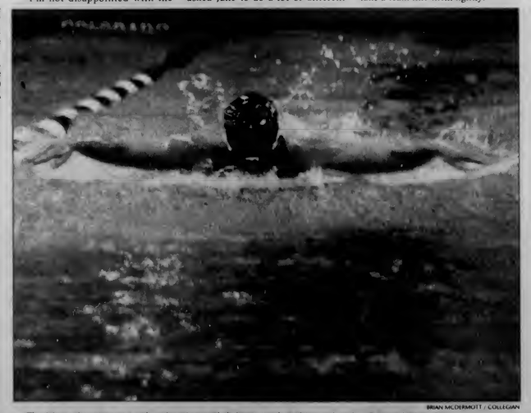
Lia Lansky, Karen Sonnwald, Shana Strothers, Barbara Hickey, and Irina Kosenko were just a few of the walking wounded for a UMass squad that picked up only two of 16 first place finishes.

"I'm not disappointed with the way that we swam against BU. We've been dealing with a lot of sick people all year long," Massachusetts women's swimming and diving coach Bob Newcomb. "We haven't been able to put a full team together for a meet yet."

Freshmen Sarah Newell and Julie Dragon had the lone first place finishes for the Minutewomen. Newell placed first in the 200 breast with a time of 2:26.40, while Dragon placed first in the 50 free with a time of 25.44.

"That was a big step for Julie by getting her first collegiate win. She has progressed phenomenally in the few months that she's been with us," Newcomb said.

Other bright spots on the afternoon included Lyndsay Crenshaw, who had a pair of second place finishes, and Julie Alexander.



"Lyndsay did a great job. She's been swimming with a lot of intensity," Newcomb said. "And we've asked Julie to do a lot of different things. She's doing a lot of stuff that she hasn't done before and she's swimming well."

Newcomb was also quick to point out the fact that he also sees improvement in his diving team.

"The divers have done well. They are improving from week to week," Newcomb said. "Stacie Haymes was second in the three–meter by only eight–tenths of a point."

UMass will next hit the water on Saturday afternoon when they will host St. John's. But, for right now, Newcomb is hoping that he will have a full squad for the meet.

"I'd like to see the whole team together. We were hoping for that to happen last weekend, and now we're hoping that it will happen this weekend. We've been trying to patch things together the best that we can," Newcomb said. "St. John's is a talented team. From what I've seen, they are pretty strong in the freestyle events and a little weaker in the other events. But we can't take a team like them lightly."

Albright meets with displaced Afghans

PESHAWAR, Pakistan (AP) — Against the backdrop of a dusty plain near this remote corner of Pakistan, Madeleine Albright listened intently as a group of luckless young Afghan women talked in somber tones about their fate as refugees.

"We are tired of our lives in exile," one woman told the U.S. secretary of state yesterday. Another spoke of the pain of being virtually destitute despite an advanced education in finance and economics.

Another told how her life had taken a fateful turn the day thieves broke into the family home in Afghanistan. She fled but her sister died when she leaped from a sixth–floor window trying to escape.

As a woman and a two–time refugee herself, once from Nazism and once from communism, Albright could identify with these star–crossed Afghans — but only to a point.

"It's very hard for me to sit here to compare myself to you; I have been very lucky, as have my friends," Albright said after hearing the tales of six women.

The six were among about 15 women, all clad in traditional Islamic head covers, who met with Albright on a cloudless afternoon at the Nasir Bagh refugee village.

FDA approves new blood thinner

WASHINGTON (AP) — Heart attack and stroke patients are about to get a new blood thinner that may lower their risk of repeat attacks slightly better than aspirin.

But doctors must decide if clopidogrel, approved by the Food and Drug Administration Monday, provides enough extra benefit to justify paying more than the pennies a day that aspirin costs.

"It will probably boil down to how various physicians and health care providers weigh the cost," said Dr. Sidney Smith Jr., former president of the American Heart Association, who hasn't yet decided whether to prescribe the drug to his own patients at the University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill.

The manufacturers, Sanofi Inc. and Bristol-Myers Squibb, declined to disclose a price, saying they would announce it when clopidogrel begins selling, by prescription, early next year. It will be sold under the brand name Plavix.

But new drugs typically are priced higher than older competitors, as companies try to recover the millions of research dollars that went into the medicines' development.

Thousands of Americans take half an aspirin or a baby aspirin every day to help prevent the blood clots that lead to heart attacks and strokes.

UMass alcohol policy comes under fire

By Jonathan Liberty
Collegian Staff

Editor's note: This is part two of a three–part series concerning the present state of the use and abuse of alcohol within the University of Massachusetts and Amherst communities. The series will conclude tomorrow with a critical look at the future state of alcohol at UMass.

As the University of Massachusetts Alcoholic Beverage Policy Task Force and the Massachusetts Board of Higher Education decide the future of the alcohol policy, the existing policy is being critically analyzed by student leaders, educators and counselors, residence hall staff and the citizens of Amherst.

Under the current alcohol policy, alcohol abuse at UMass has become a rampant problem both at the University itself and in the town of Amherst.

Vital questions, such as where did the alcohol policy fail, how does culture affect alcohol abuse, and what programs are available to assist students with alcohol problems, have become a focal point for the UMass and Amherst communities.

The pitfalls of the current policy

The current alcoholic beverage policy, which is located in the Undergraduate Rights and Responsibilities handbook, has been harshly criticized throughout the fall semester.

Michael Burchell, Area Director of Southwest/North, said he supports the existing policy in dealing with the basics of underage drinking, but says that it leaves much room for education and prevention.

"I've been here for six years and the alcohol policy here, as compared to other schools, is very lax," Burchell said. "It's very simple and provides a lot of space for students to do a lot of stuff."

According to Burchell, one of the reasons for the lax alcohol policy is the University's focus on students' rights.

"My perspective is that this University is very based within students' rights and not students' responsibility," Burchell said.

"Students who are 21–years–old have the right to drink, but they do not have the right to infringe on others," said Community Health Educator Sally Damon. "This isn't about not drinking, it's about making the community safe and having respect for your self and everyone around you."

> " It's not about drinking, it's about drinking with responsibility. I think people can drink responsibly, but our culture is about drinking to excess."
> — Barbara O'Connor

Whereas students in the dormitories are allowed to have up to 10 people in one room (with both residents of that room being present), drinking behind closed doors has become increasingly easy, forcing much more pressure on RAs to enforce the policy.

"They [the students] want to be able to drink and do drugs because they are used to parents and teachers and other adults just looking the other way," said Residential Education Alcohol Program (REAP) Coordinator Sandra Whitcomb. "The RAs have to try to control these situations."

"While the RAs do all they can to enforce the alcohol policy, you can't tell when someone is drinking behind a closed door," said UMass Deputy Chief Barbara O'Connor.

"I have received a lot of e–mail from parents about what goes on in the dorms," said Chancellor David K. Scott. "It doesn't seem very healthy what goes on in some places."

"What ends up happening is policy gets created and then RAs have to take care of it," Burchell said. "The RA staff has a hard enough time enforcing the alcohol policy as it stands."

If a new policy is created, enforcement will be one of the crucial issues, said O'Connor.

"You can't ban alcohol and not give police any enforcement tools, we would need some bylaws to help us enforce the policy," O'Connor said.

"The general consensus that's beginning to emerge is that the current policy with some modifications is a reasonable policy which needs better enforcement," said Associate Chancellor and Alcoholic Beverage Task Force Chair Susan Pearson.

Into Amherst

Besides causing problems at the University, alcohol abuse by off–campus students has also troubled the town of Amherst.

"Amherst used to be pretty damn quiet," said Black Sheep owner and 22 year resident of Amherst, Nick Seamon. "When the drinking age was raised to 21, colleges banned alcohol, and drove kids into town."

"My responsibility as a select board member is the health, welfare and happiness of all residents of Amherst, not only off–campus students, but also the residents of Amherst, who are negatively affected every single weekend of the year," said Hill Boss, a select board member and a 14–year resident of Amherst.

"I don't think there's a reason students and older people can't co–exist," said Walker Lee, owner of Walker's Grill and Amherst resident since 1973.

But according to Boss, "this year is worse than last year, and last year was worse than the year before."

During the fiscal year 1995–96, the Amherst police department received calls of service for 1153 noise complaints, 413 accounts of vandalism, 371 disturbances, 132 fights and 60 liquor law violations. While 65 arrests were made for disorderly conduct.

According to Boss, stronger University action against students in Amherst who are causing the problems is one possible solution.

"Off–campus students are enrolled as on campus students are and have the same standing and same tuition as on– campus students, yet in refusing to apply the student code of conduct equally to on– and off–campus students, the University creates two different classes of students," Boss said.

According to Boss, the town should enforce open container, public intoxication and underage drinking laws — rather than giving students a slap on the wrists — the maximum penalties should be enforced.

> "No one can force someone to get help with an alcohol problem unless it is a legal matter. You can have all of the services in the world, but the student has to want to get the help."
> — Sally Damon

The method of dealing with alcohol has changed over time, changes including the town's institution of keg and open container laws, said Amherst Police Chief Donald Maia.

"I think the problem lies with keg parties, and illegal selling of alcohol. People have gotten into fights as a result, and the kids just drink," said Traffic Enforcement Officer Willie Wheeler.

According to Boss, banning the sale of kegs is a possible solution to large, off–campus parties.

"[Kegs] are the cheapest possible way of letting people get intoxicated; and it allows for the sale of liquor without checking licenses — off–campus residences and fraternities sell cups or admission, which is a clear violation of the law," Boss said.

However, according to Damon, kegs are not as responsible as the general attitude at fraternity parties.

"The problem with fraternities is that most of the brothers are already heavy drinkers. They have self–selected that environment to live in because they want to be around others who want drink as much as they do," Damon said.

"In general, I think that the majority of Amherst people are happy that the University students are here, and wouldn't want it any other way," Boss said. "But in regards to the drinking problem, it depends on the proximity to the school.

"People within shouting distance of the school are livid," Boss said.

"I've seen an increase in alcohol abuse the past three years and I've heard similar sentiments from others as well, culminating this fall in various injuries and a death," said Amherst Town Manager Darry Del Casto.

The "cultural policy"

How much could a new policy affect the abuse of alcohol on campus? Problems with alcohol transcend party atmosphere, peer pressure, availability of alcohol or any sort of policy. Alcohol abuse is part of American culture, according to O'Connor.

"It's not about drinking, it's about drinking with responsibility. I think people can drink responsibly, but our culture is about drinking to excess," O'Connor said.

"The fact is it [alcohol abuse] does effect the environment and the quality of life for other people in residence halls," Scott said. "It's not just individual's issue, it is the community's issue."

Militants to blame for massacre

By Tarek El–Tablawy
Associated Press

LUXOR, Egypt — Militants blamed for most of the violence in Egypt's five–year Islamic rebellion claimed responsibility yesterday for the revolt's deadliest attack: the massacre of 62 people at an ancient temple crowded with tourists.

The al-Gamaa al-Islamiya, or the Islamic Group, said in a faxed statement that Monday's attack was a failed attempt to take hostages to trade for the freedom of their spiritual leader, a blind Egyptian cleric jailed in the United States for plotting to bomb New York landmarks.

The sandstone terraces of the Temple of Hatshepsut were bloodstained yesterday, but dozens of tourists warily returned. Many others were fleeing the country, however, and agencies were scrapping tours — spelling trouble for Egypt's important tourism industry.

President Hosni Mubarak visited the temple on the Nile River's West Bank across from Luxur to reassure tourists, and replaced his interior minister, blaming him for lax security.

Thirty-one of the dead were Swiss, police said. The others included eight Japanese, five Germans, four Britons — including a child — a Bulgarian, a Colombian and a French citizen. Seven of the dead were still unidentified. There were 24 people wounded. Police shot the six attackers as they

Conference examines roles of clergy among different religions

By Paul Hayes
Collegian Staff

What do you get when you put a Muslim, a Judaic, a Baha'i and a Zen Buddhist on a panel?

The answer: A very thoughtful, intriguing and insightful discourse.

Representatives of each of these four apparently disparate religious groups came together last night to take part in a panel discussion entitled "Connecting to the Divine: Do We Need Clergy?" as part of the Inter–Religious dialogues program sponsored by the UMass Inter Religious Project which is being held all this week.

The members of the panel, Kamal Ali of the Islamic Society of Western Massachusetts, Ellen Rosenthal of the Hampshire College Jewish organization Keshet, Sabrina Asress of the Baha'i Faith Community and Issho Fujita of Valley Zendo each had their own interpretation of whet clergy and their necessity were.

Ali, who is a spiritual guide — or Imam — of Islam said that "clergy" were not necessary.

"Clergy," he said, implied men who served as intermediaries between people and a higher power, where as the Imam were men chosen from a community whose job it was to instruct other Muslims on their holy text, the Koran.

"Islam is a verb, something you do and it's incumbent for Muslims to remember the Koran for their own edification and practice," Ali said.

The other panelists agreed that they did not believe their spiritual leaders were direct links to God.

Just as Imam function in regards to Muslims, Rabbis help provide Jews with answers, Rosenthal said.

"Rabbis are social workers, social helpers and teachers," Rosenthal said. "Mainly teachers because not everyone has the opportunity to study the Torah."

Like Muslims, Jews are also people of the book, Rosenthal said.

Japanese Soto Zen Buddhists, on the other hand are not.

Fujito described the monks who taught him as very committed practitioners who helped him to avoid the pitfalls of everyday life.

Similar to Ali's description of Muslim Imams, Buddhist monks teach submission to religious laws, and endeavor for their pupils to live spiritually all day in everything they do.

Unlike the other three religions, the Baha'i have no spiritual leadership, Asress said.

In the Baha'i faith, children of members are expected to investigate every religion, and then at the age of 15 judge for themselves which religion they feel they believe in, Asress said.

Baha'i parents will direct their children to information on religions, and then leave the rest up to them, Asress said.

"The greatest cause of bereavement in man is ignorance and blind imitation," Asress said, "[Baha'i belief] depends on your own reason and judgement."

If, at 15, a child chooses to remain Baha'i, that means they accept all religions as "different pages in the same book," Asress said.

Ali said that if it weren't for the guidance of Imam and the scholarship of Islam, he never would have overcome his youthful tendencies towards dancing and girls.

Fujita said that he learned Buddhist traditions such as offering his dinner to Buddha because if he didn't, his parents didn't let him eat. Then he accidentally entered a one week retreat at a Zen monastery, which he found difficult.

"It was painful and boring," Fujita said, "but then deep in my soul I felt I'd come home."

The religions each reflect different fingerprints of faith. Ali said, but like fingerprints each was recognizable in the others.

"Alcohol use among students is beginning at earlier ages," Whitcomb said. "These students enter the University with well-established drinking problems."

According to UMass Community Health Educator Sally Damon, a person's drinking problems greatly depends on their family backgrounds.

"The family's attitude around alcohol can strengthen or weaken the problem," Damon said.

The perception of many college students, according to Burchell, is that drinking is part of the college experience and that everyone is supposed to get drunk.

"There needs to educational intervention," Burchell said.

"Many students who live in apartments or dorms where there is constant drinking don't know how to not drink," said Trina Hope, Coordinator of the Response Team at Cooley Dickinson Hospital.

According to Whitcomb, students who are able to stop drinking while in counseling often go right back to it after they leave due to the cultural climate.

"It's very hard for students to go through treatment in an environment where substances are readily available," Whitcomb said.

"We have many students who stop drinking, but many need more help and once they leave here, they go right back into the environment that celebrates drinking," Whitcomb said.

Counseling programs

Although many resources, such as the REAP, Mental Health Services, University Health Services, employee assistance program, alcohol and drug education program and substance free housing, are available at UMass, students usually have to be mandated by the courts or Housing Judicial system before they go for help.

"No one can force someone to get help with an alcohol problem unless it is a legal matter," Damon said. "You can have all of the services in the world, but the student has to want to get the help."

According to Whitcomb, so far this semester at REAP, 43 students were referred by courts, 33 by Residential Directors and five were self-referred.

"The court has always been good about referring people to see us," Whitcomb said. "They want students to get help and do not feel as if fining them does any good."

Sally Damon, UMass Community Health Educator, said that during this semester 10 to 15 friends of students come into the health center because they are concerned about a friend's drinking habits, while only two or three students have come in by themselves.

"What has been interesting for me is the extent to which we already have a phenomenal education program for students: health programs, residential programs, REAP, Everywomen's Center, Greek Affairs — we've got a lot of stuff here," said Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Tom Robinson. "I know that we put a lot of energy into these programs."

"The key to helping these students is being respectful and letting them know that we really do care about them and their future," Whitcomb said.

Collegian staff members Paul Hayes, Victoria Groves, Leigh Faulkner and Tamar Carroll contributed to this article.

tried to escape.

Authorities said one was a member of al-Gamaa, the group that claimed responsibility for the attack.

Al-Gamaa has been a main target of police battling a violent campaign aimed at overthrowing Mubarak's secular government and turning Egypt into a strict Islamic state.

The government has arrested and jailed thousands of suspected radicals, put hundreds on trial and executed 63 people in the past five years. But al-Gamaa and similar radical groups are difficult to fight because of their small, loosely connected cells.

Last year, al-Gamaa took responsibility for killing 16 Greek tourists at a hotel near the pyramids on the edge of Cairo. The group also claimed an assassination attempt on Mubarak while he was visiting Ethiopia in June 1995; he was unharmed.

In its statement yesterday, the group said the gunmen's "brave" hostage attempt went awry because police opened fire too quickly, forcing militants to return fire. It accused police of showing negligence toward the safety of tourists.

"The government forces dealt lightly with the lives of the tourists and the citizens, leading to the falling of this great number of dead," it said.

Witnesses, however, said the six gunmen opened fire as soon as they entered the temple grounds, spraying wildly with automatic weapons and killing 58 foreign tourists and four Egyptians. A coroner's report said some victims were stabbed after being shot. One Swiss survivor said the "very young" gunmen calmly shot victims who had dived to the ground or run for cover behind temple pillars.

Rosemarie Dousse, the Swiss tourist shot in the arm and the leg, hid under the bodies of other tourists for at least an hour.

"They made us get down on our knees. And then they started shooting. A man who was very heavy fell on top of me and the lady behind me also covered me," she said. "Then they started again — shooting those who were still alive, in the head."

Police gunned down one attacker at the site and the five others after they hijacked a bus. Authorities counted only six gunmen, but the al-Gamaa statement said nine others escaped.

It said it had hoped to trade hostages for the release of Sheik Omar Abdel Rahman, imprisoned for plotting to blow up the United Nations building and other New York landmarks.

Missile did not down TWA plane

By Pat Milton
Associated Press

NEW YORK — A CIA video simulation released yesterday concludes that witnesses to the crash of TWA Flight 800 saw the breakup of the doomed plane in the seconds after the initial explosion, not the explosion itself.

What some people thought was a missile hitting the plane was burning, leaking fuel from the jet after the front part of it had already broken off. FBI officials said as they formally called off their criminal probe.

"Following 16 months of unprecedented investigation... we must now report that no evidence has been found which would indicate that a criminal act was the cause," Assistant Director James Kallstrom said.

The Paris-bound jet blew up over the Atlantic shortly after takeoff July 17, 1996, killing all 230 aboard. Families of victims looked on as Kallstrom discussed the FBI probe, one of the largest criminal investigations in U.S. history. He said the FBI had spent $14 million to $20 million on the investigation.

The video simulation — which victims' families had viewed earlier — included vivid recreations of what witnesses miles away on Long Island or other aircraft said they saw that night.

"All 244 witnesses we firmly believe told us what they saw," Kallstrom said after the video was played. Most witness accounts are remarkably similar, he said.

The witnesses saw the disintegrating plane well after the center fuel tank blew up, the FBI concluded. Because sound travels more slowly than light, they heard the sound of the blast seconds later. That made them think they were seeing the start of the crash when in fact they were watching its end, the agency said.

"Today there is no evidence that anyone saw a missile shoot down TWA Flight 800," the videotape concluded.

The FBI's withdrawal leaves the investigation in the hands of the National Transportation Safety Board, which has scheduled hearings for next month. The NTSB has indicated no probable cause will be declared until late 1998.

Earlier, Kallstrom addressed the question of friendly fire, perhaps a U.S. missile test gone awry — a contentious issue that investigators repeatedly rejected.

"Concerning the issue of friendly fire, we conducted a total and thorough investigation," Kallstrom said. "Of course we asked the military the tough question — 'Did you do it?' — and of course the answer was no." But the FBI analysis of hundreds of eyewitness interviews and satellite and radar data only explained what witnesses saw, not whether a missile or bomb brought down the jetliner, Kallstrom stressed. Other evidence led investigators to rule out a bomb or a missile, however, he said.

Kallstrom said more than 500 agents dispatched to the scene were joined by investigators from the NTSB, Federal Aviation Administration, State Department, and numerous local and state law enforcement agencies.

Agents conducted more than 7,000 interviews and spoke with scores of workers at Kennedy Airport and in Athens, Greece, where the plane stopped before coming to New York.

They reviewed 911 calls of reports of suspicious cars or boats along the coast and at Kennedy for two months before the crash and inspected marinas throughout the region.

On/off switches offerred for air bags

By Catherine Strong
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The government decision to allow some motorists to get on-off switches for air bags has thrust the controversy over the safety devices into the laps of parents such as Nina Kaull and Deanna Popielarz.

"I have mixed feelings about it. I just don't know," said Mrs. Kaull, who ferries her own 6-year-old and a neighbor's children to school in Washington nearly every day.

But Mrs. Popielarz, who car pools to school with her four children and other families' kids in Saginaw, Mich., said, "I'm considering it. I think it's great to have the option."

Motorists at risk of injury from air bags — including short adults and those who drive car pools and must have a child in the front seat — will be allowed to fill out a federal form and have the on-off switch installed starting Jan. 19.

It's a response to the outcry over 87 deaths from air bags in low-speed crashes. Most were unbelted or improperly belted. Air bags, now mandatory in new cars, also are credited with saving 2,600 lives.

Even as they announced the liberalized rule for giving some motorists' control over the safety devices, federal officials hastened to emphasize they believe people would be better off leaving their air bags on and keeping kids out of front seats. "We have made a difficult decision. Now it is the public's turn to make theirs," Transportation Secretary Rodney Slater told a news conference.

White House spokesman Mike McCurry called it "a common-sense solution."

President Clinton promised last December to make it easier for motorists to get air bags deactivated.

Under the new rule, vehicle owners in these four categories can get the on-off switches:

-Those who must put children in the front seat because they are in a car pool or have large families and must use every seat.

• Those who cannot sit at least 10 inches from the air bag. • Those with medical conditions in which the air bag poses a special risk.

• Those who must put rear-facing infant seats in the front seat.

"This is a practical solution that allows you to turn off the air bag for someone at risk and turn it back on to preserve the lifesaving benefits for everyone else," said Slater.

The National Highway Traffic Safety Administration will start accepting requests for the switches Dec. 18 and allow dealers and repair shops to start installing them Jan. 19.

People such as Mrs. Popielarz know the ball is in their court. The estimated cost of an air bag switch — $150 to $200 — wouldn't stop her from getting one, she said. And she would like the front seat in her minivan to transport more kids when necessary.

"But the problem would be if you forgot to turn the air bag back on for an adult, or turn the switch off for a child," she said.

Nobody knows how many consumers will deactivate air bags — although some auto officials have estimated it could be several million.

Automakers, insurers and safety advocacy groups all emphasized that the vast majority of people benefit from air bags. They spent much of the day advising consumers to buckle up children properly and put children age 12 and under in the back seat. Some 40 percent of children ride unbuckled.

"Only someone who is very close to, or on top of, an air bag as it first begins to inflate is at risk of serious inflation injury," said Brian O'Neill, president of the Insurance Institute for Highway Safety.

President Bulger's new office

Apparently Billy Bulger's outgrown his old office. Having raised millions of dollars, he figures he should be able to enjoy a little of it himself. Actually, he's going to be enjoying a lot of it. The lease on his old office on unfashionable Tremont Street is running out, so he figures he'll take the opportunity to upscale. And he's doing it in a big way. His new office is one of the most desired addresses in the city. Located on Boylston Street, it's the workplace of the richest and most politically connected of Boston. Where else could Billy work?

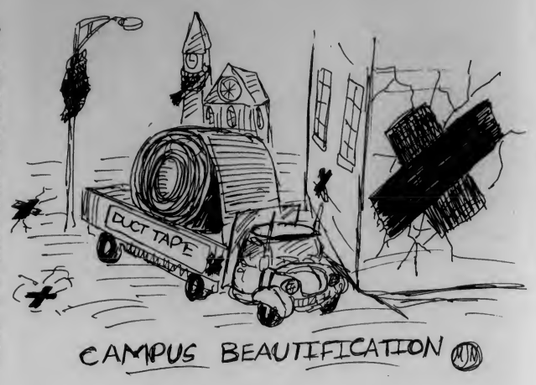
Maybe somewhere where rent isn't $1 million a year. I think that would make a lot of us here in the land of crumbling buildings feel a lot better. It seems odd to me that the man whose politically astute enough to rise to the position of President of the Senate would be able to figure out that spending a cool million on himself would probably be an unpopular move.

It's also strange that someone who's been in politics so long doesn't realize how tight state budgets are. I don't remember the exact figures, but his old office was significantly cheaper. That extra money could have done a lot here. It could have provided a lot of students with full or partial scholarships. It could have upgraded some of our hideous living and learning areas. It could have funded a few extra professorships, or provided for more research. It could have helped our TA's out of poverty. In other words, it could have been devoted to the real mission of UMass: providing a high-quality, affordable education.

I shouldn't be so harsh. I think Billy's just getting confused. Having spent so much energy using private university tactics to raise money, it must be hard to stoop to public accoutrements. I'm sure Neil Rudenstein, president of Harvard, has a great office. Billy must be jealous.



Sorry big guy, but until you make that big leap into the world of private academia, your going to have to surrender your high-class tastes. Besides, as long as we here have to live in cinder-block cells, why should you get a posh office? There are plenty of ways to gussy the old one up. Do what we do: slap up a few posters. Make a beer can pyramid. Get a carpet remnant — nothing makes an otherwise ugly tile floor a little more welcoming. Houseplants do wonders for an otherwise barren workspace. But you're busy (so make sure you get the kind you don't have to water too often).

See? You'll make it in the old office. No, you won't get to hobnob with your power-wielding buddies at the coffee maker, but I was under the impression that you're pretty well connected as it is. Besides, you'll have a much easier time convincing people that UMass needs money if you're not sitting in a brownstone. And they'll probably be much happier to give it if they see that you're not going to waste it on frivolities.

I'm sure you know that many of us here work quite hard for our education. In fact, I remember you sharing with us the story of your plight, of how hard you had to work to get through school. So surely you must understand why we don't want to see our money being spent on your office.

Please Mr. Bulger, stay where you are. Don't go squandering all that money you've raised. Or at least, if you have to waste it on something, waste it on us.

Gerrit Deyoung is a UMass student.

The hoofs of a swinish multitude

> "If we let our Young Folks grow Head-Strong, and if we grow Afraid of compelling them to the Wholesome Orders of our Families, we have even given them up to Ruin." — Cotton Mather.

The third deadly sin in this four-part series on the neo-puritanical war against liberty and pleasure is the sin of talking. Or, to be more specific, talking out of turn, speaking without having been spoken to, mouthing off, which is to say — protesting. The protest ban issued late in the summer by Chancellor Scott under the innocuous-sounding title "Guidelines for Responses to Demonstrations on University Property," participates fully in the onslaught of resurgent Puritanism.

Political protesting, especially by large groups gathered in demonstrations, and building occupations, is a point of precise intersection in the trajectories of liberty and pleasure. The cases of smoking and drinking, which we dealt with in previous columns, are about our liberty to enjoy pleasure. In the case of protesting and free speech, it is rather a matter of taking pleasure in exercising our liberty.

Student protest, as the anxious authorities are only too aware, especially of the kind we have generally seen here at UMass, is after all not just a matter of political action. It also takes the highly threatening form of the carnivalesque — an overturning of the usual order where social hierarchies are inverted, reversed and disturbed.

Students literally take the place of administrators, who then have to negotiate, from an uncomfortable position of weakness, to recover their territory and authority. For those who protest, such actions are serious and risky, but also thrilling and extremely exiting, not least of all from the frisson of defying authority. As in any carinvalesque, extraordinary experiences of all kinds are commonplace.

Administrators and other authorities, on the other hand, experience "this strange chaos of levity and ferocity" as the ultimate threat, which also explains why their reaction during the Goddell protest was characterized by weeping, fainting and extreme emotional outbursts.

Sleazy politicos such as Rep. Murphy sought to exploit the protest by demanding draconian crackdowns. Right-wing faculty extremists, led by Professor Robert Costrell of economics, demanded mass arrests and police action.

Scott and Bulger were quick to respond with the new "Guidelines," without which, as Edmund Burke warned, "Learning will be cast into the mire and trodden down under the hoofs of a swinish multitude."

As Chancellor, Scott quickly established his absolute hostility to freedom of speech. His mentality is that of village tyrant, with an obsession for secrecy. Needless to say, his assertion that his new protest ban was developed with "extensive input from our campus" is an utter, bald-faced lie. It was yet another of his brutish edicts.

In Scott's handling of the Goddell protest, we have seen (as Charles Merill predicted) several kinds of bad leadership, since Scott behaved as both coward and bully at the same time. During the protest, Scott was nowhere to be seen. He had fled to Mexico, on a vacation which he unconvincingly insists was, by extraordinary good fortune and complete coincidence, planned many months in advance.

In any event, he had no compunction about leaving his overwrought underlings to deal with the crisis. Upon returning, Scott continued to allow various subordinates, especially the (former) Provost Pat Crosson to take the fall for fearless leader.

During summer, when all was quiet, coward morphed into bully. Scott issued his protest ban and sent all students a threatening letter warning them to keep quiet or else.

Scott and his cronies say that they are not opposed to protest and free speech, as long as they are not "disruptive." Law and order versus anarchy, you see. But authorities seldom object to so-called protests which they can define and control.

As an example of this, see Mike Thelwell's celebrated essay on the 1963 March on Washington, "The Castrated Giant," for a description of how the Kennedy administration used the march by strictly regulating what could be said, and not said, at the march. Official and approved placards were the only signs allowed. A. Philip Randolph ensured that John Lewis' speech, which included a passage describing Kennedy's policies as "too little, too late," was rewritten at the last minute to avoid any embarrassment to Kennedy.

In fact, what the Chancellor wishes to exterminate is the possibility of another student protest and building-takeover that is defined not only by its political seriousness, but also by its carnivalesque transgressions.

Scott's protest ban is therefore one of the most egregious offensives from the culture of mediocrity and conformity.

This "protest ban" merely invites another such takeover and protest. As such, it shares another defining characteristic of the Puritan approach to smoking and drinking: it is intrinstically self-defeating and doomed to failure.

The "swinish multitude," that is to say people, simply won't stand for it.

Point/Counterpoint on Iraq

The Ed/Op page will be running a point/counterpoint feature on the escalating tensions between the United States and Iraq. Anyone interested in expressing their opinion on this issue is urged to submit an editorial. Editorials should be well-researched and well-written, 600-800 words long, and must be received by 9 p.m. on Wednesday, Nov. 19. If suitable columns are received earlier, the Point/Counterpoint may be moved forward, so it is important to submit your editorials as soon as possible.

Submissions can be dropped of at our offices in the Campus Center basement, e-mailed to letters@oitvms.oit.umass.edu, or faxed to 545-1592. Please put them to the attention of Dan Bodah, Ed/Op Editor.

Support needed for bilingual education

The new wedge issue in California is the "English Language Education for Immigrant Children" initiative. It proposes to abolish bilingual education and will probably appear on the ballot in 1998.

The proponents of the anti-bilingual education initiative, Ron Unz and Gloria Matta Tuchman, may very well be sincere when they say they want to help children. But if passed, the initiative will unleash further attacks on the public-education system.

> African-Americans need to support bilingual education and vote this initiative down. If not for altruistic reasons, then for pragmatism's sake, since an attack on bilingual education is just the first step in a renewed onslaught against the public-education system.
> Gary Phillips

Schoolchildren and their parents will bear the brunt of this single-minded agenda. For the most part, bilingual-education programs do what they're supposed to do — help immigrant kids enter the mainstream. They assist kids from non-English speaking backgrounds to acquire English-language skills. Successful examples have depended on a commitment from the local administration, and resources from the school district, to make such programs work.

One of the most successful models originated at Eastman Avenue Elementary School in Los Angeles. It evolved into Project M.O.R.E., and now this curriculum is used at several other schools.

Admittedly, bilingual education has in some cases been flawed in its implementation. Occasionally, school bureaucracy pits teacher against teacher, favoring those with bilingual skills. This too often sets Latino professionals against their black and white peers. There must be parity, and the system cannot ignore the years of hard work put in by teachers at the expense of making thoughtless staffing decisions.

Yet this does not invalidate the overall worth of bilingual education. The trick is getting the details right, not in scrapping the entire undertaking.

African-Americans need to support bilingual education and vote this initiative down. If not for altruistic reasons, then for pragmatism's sake, since an attack on bilingual education is just the first step in a renewed onslaught against the public-education system.

We need to recognize an assault on minorities when we see one. And we need to recognize an assault on public schools, where most of us send our kids.

Right-wing forces are sensing the opportunity. Groups such as the Christian Coalition want to gut public schools by transferring public money to religious and other private schools. Does anybody remember Proposition 174? That was an initiative to enact vouchers in California in 1993. That effort failed.

The fight against bilingual education is just another attempt to weaken public schools.

Gary Phillips is the project director of the Multicultural Collaborative in Los Angeles.

Letters to the Editor

Thank you from a sista

To the editor:

This letter is written in response to Kenny Lacoste's article in the Nov. 17 issue of The Daily Collegian. On behalf of myself and other black women I would like to thank Kenny for writing such a beautiful article. It is nice to know that there are still some true brothas out there who queens. I can only hope that the black men who do not have respect for their black sistas whom they refer to as (bitch, ho, tramp, hootchie and piece of ass) along with the black women who disrespect themselves and the brothas actually learned something from your article. Thank you from a sista.

U.S. Mid-East policy continues to implode

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Young Iraqis at a cotton and textile factory in Baghdad demonstrate to show their willingness to be human shields in case of an American military attack.

The ongoing "showdown" with Iraq provides yet another indication of the catastrophic implosion occurring in United States' Middle East policy.

The empty bluster and hollow threats from the Clinton regime are starting to make even the most credulous observers wonder if something isn't dreadfully wrong.

The back-drop to the latest "crisis" is the horrific sanctions forced on Iraq by the United States since August of 1990.

This unprecedented sanctions regime, which National Security Advisor Sandy Berger boasted "are the most pervasive sanctions ever imposed on a nation in the history of mankind," has proven to be a genuine weapon of mass destruction.

> Hussein Ibish

There is, however, very little recognition here that the United States has presided over the genocidal killing of well over a million Iraqi civilians in the past seven years.

On the rare occasions that the subject is raised, American leaders generally try to blame the victim, suggesting that the fault lies, not with those who designed and enforce the sanctions, but somehow with the Iraqi government.

And as for the moral question raised by the needless deaths of millions of Iraqis, Madeline Albright told "60 Minutes," "We think it's worth it." This from a woman who has recently been investigating her family's suffering during the Holocaust in World War II.

Western diplomats have been fairly blunt in stating that, whatever the official policy might be, the sanctions will never be lifted as long as President Saddam Hussein and the Ba'ath Party remain in power.

The sanctions, as well as the "no fly zones," are explicitly designed to destroy the Baghdad government's sovereignty in Iraq and create conditions that will lead to the overthrowing of Saddam by starving the population.

The struggle, therefore, is over who is to exercise ultimate sovereignty over Iraq — the Iraqi government or the American Empire.

Iraq's "outrageous" action, which is the supposed cause of the current crisis, was to demand simply that the U.N. weapons inspection teams not include U.S. citizens. This is a normal and reasonable sovereign request, of a kind made this year by, among others new Congolese leader Laurent Kabila and Israeli chieftain Bibi Netanyahu.

The Iraqis have been, so far quite successfully, trying to take advantage of the collapse of the two other key U.S. Middle East policies — the Oslo accords in Palestine and the "containment" of Iran.

The Oslo accords, which are the centerpiece of U.S. Middle East policy, have been systematically dismantled by the extremist Israeli Prime Minister Netanyahu since his election a year ago. Recently, Netanyahu put the final nail in the Oslo coffin by declaring the Oslo treaties effectively null and void and renouncing Israel's Oslo process commitments.

Not only has this wrecked U.S. policy in the Middle East completely, but by refusing to discipline the recalcitrant Israelis, the U.S. has greatly damaged its regional and international credibility.

The collapsed Doha Economic Conference this week clearly demonstrates the scope of the disaster.

The U.S. is seen as having no control over its most dependent client-state, and because of discredited eccentricities in the American political and campaign finance system at that.

The U.S. campaign to isolate Iran has been totally demolished this summer with the signing of the $2 billion oil deal between Iran and the Total corporation of France. It is increasingly clear Washington's anti-Iranian stance has isolated the United States, not Iran.

Moreover, the U.S. has had bitter disputes in past months with both Russia and China over trade issues in the Middle East, neither of which have been impressed by American bullying. Therefore, Russia, China and France — all U.N. Security Council Permanent Members — have little regard for U.S. Middle East Policy these days.

Added to this is the wide-spread realization that the American sanctions on Iraq are a total failure in their implicit aim of overthrowing Saddam. Iraq's recent assertion of sovereignty arises almost naturally in this context.

There is, therefore, almost no international support for the initial U.S. impulse to attack Iraq. Even U.S. dependencies in the Persian Gulf have objected to an attack on Iraq.

The U.S. had to quickly climb down from its early bluster of the first two days of the dispute, when continuous and explicit threats of bombing were routine.

Even Washington analysts have realized that they have been completely outmaneuvered this time. The sanctions cannot be increased and more bombing will not succeed where the thousands of other American bombs failed.

It is clear to everyone that if the U.S. does attack Iraq under this filmiest of pretexts and against the demands of the international community, it will only serve to bring forward the day when the sanctions have to be lifted.

Already in the Middle East, and increasingly around the world, the question is what shall be the long term role of Iraq. The U.S. was confident that Saddam would be overthrown after the Gulf War and, when that didn't happen, attempted a series of bungled and bizarre CIA coup plots to oust him, all of which were fiascos.

The idea that torturing the Iraqi people and murdering millions of them with the sanctions would lead them to remove their President on behalf of the American Empire has proved to be another mirage. What, then, is to be done?

In responding to Iraq's latest assertions of sovereignty, the Clinton regime has demonstrated that it has no idea how to handle the problem other than lashing-out in a clearly counter-productive and excessive manner.

American desperation can be gauged by the preposterous claims that Iraq has a serious chemical and biological weapons program. President Clinton says "I want you to... think about it in terms of the innocent Japanese people that died in the subway..." I'll bet he does.

The U.N. Inspection team, led by the uncouth Australian Richard Butler, have listed the most basic Iraqi industries as "dual use" facilities, meaning that under certain conditions they could be used to make something suspect. So much for vaccine labs and fertilizer factories, so much for 20th century technology in Iraq, so much for rebuilding.

The western media have swallowed the ludicrous "Iraqi weapons of mass destruction story" hook, line and sinker. After all, the Gulf War was the source of one of the most cynical and effective propaganda campaigns of all time. Fabricated tales of Iraqi brutality in Kuwait, most notoriously the legendary "babies thrown out of incubators" fairytales defined the debate, even in the U.S. Senate.

Of the non-existent dead babies, President George Bush said "there's no horror that could make this a more obvious conflict of good versus evil..." A few days later he declared President Saddam Hussein to be "worse than Hitler."

In the current dispute, this same combination of fabricated Iraqi crimes and extreme hyperbole to justify U.S. aggression against Iraq re-emerged on cue.

The New York Times has become so overwhelmed with hysteria that it described Saddam Hussein in terms of "the threat that he represents to the biosphere, the envelope of air and water that he proposes to infest with pestilences that respect no political boundaries." As evidence the Times warns that Iraq could have access to anthrax. Perhaps we should inform Richard Butler and Madeline Albright that UMass Professor Curtis Thorne has been conducting anthrax research for the Pentagon over in Morrill Hall for years.

The rest of the world knows far better than to be fooled by this transparent propaganda. Even in nations which participated in the Gulf War and have little love for Saddam Hussein, both the horror of the sanctions genocide and the absurdity of the recent weapons allegations are increasing. The sense that the U.S. has gone too far this time.

For example, Egypt's semi-official Al-Ahram newspaper scoffed at the ridiculous weapons allegations and pointed out that Butler and the American inspectors have been systematically "contriving disputes over extremely trivial details so as to prevent the U.N. inspection team from declaring its mission accomplished. The aim is to continue starving and besieging the Iraqi people in order to exclude them from the power equation in the Arab world, without the slightest regard for their human rights and under the banner of the United Nations."

If the United States decides to attack Iraq under these circumstances, it will only be shooting itself in the foot.

So far, Iraq seems to have succeeded in reasserting its sovereignty and demonstrating the moral and political bankruptcy of American policy in the Middle East.

Iraqis in Baghdad demonstrate their national pride and unity.

Note from the editor

Since the Gulf War, the U.S. sanctions on Iraq have caused considerable damage to the livelihood of millions of innocent Iraqis. The recent barrage of anti-Arab propaganda promulgated by the U.S. media has managed to once again place a veil of misunderstanding over the eyes of the American public.

> Christine Soh

Coverage in everything from the local press to the ubiquitous CNN has given its audience "Middle East commentaries" that offer only generalizations and distortions. Once again, Iraqis are portrayed as violators of human rights as they are forcing civilians — children included — to form a human fortress in order to protect the infrastructure of their country from possible U.S. air strikes. Iraqis are also portrayed as owning a blind and irrational devotion to the "madman" Saddam Hussein.

CNN has labeled the conflict, "Showdown with Iraq," indicating a degree of media bias that can only be described as war propaganda. In a Sunday morning CNN news report, an Iraqi civilian was quoted as saying, "there are 22 million Iraqis. Even if the U.S. kills 3 million of us, we'll still be here." This statement echoes the Iraqi people's defiant "down with America" stance and uncompromising commitment to their national independence. Of course, in the eyes of the western media, this pride only further displays the Iraqis' irrational, inhuman and uncivilized nature. In essence, the great American propaganda machine has given public legitimacy which serves as a green light for further attacks by U.S. forces.

What is neglected in the supposed critical coverage on this affair are the numerous and ongoing protests against the U.N. sanctions throughout the world, and the well-over one million Iraqi deaths through starvation and disease which they have caused.

Also deliberately ignored is the connection between the U.S. pressure on Iraq as compared with its lack of pressure put on Israel. However, this striking contradiction is being heavily scrutinized in the international press.

Also completely neglected in the American press is the U.S.'s reason for involvement with Iraq to begin with. The "down with the U.S.A." sentiment in Iraq suggests that the issue is one of national independence and self-determination for Iraqis. The self-appointed U.S. role as the universal police for the internal affairs of all peoples is seen at its most brazen in Iraq. Therefore it is hardly just the Iraqis who see themselves as a small nation besieged by a great imperial power.

The issue of Iraq is highly relevant to Multicultural Affairs, in part because the coverage given to it by major presses has had an anti-Arab and anti-Islamic character. This stereotyping has conditioned mainstream Americans to view all people from the Middle East as terrorists, fundamentalists, or innately insane — giving no regard whatsoever to their ideas or political perspective. A perfect example of this is the lack of news coverage given to the opinion of most Middle Eastern people, not to mention the the rest of the world, on the question of Palestine.

In short, the Third World, and its freedom, is one of the crucial components that defines our multicultural society. These issues are as imperative to multicultural affairs as homelessness, welfare and even the honors college debate. The effects of American imperialism directly affect disadvantaged peoples in this country and the rest of the world by perpetuating and increasing injustice. Whether it is poverty and economic Insecurity, the ostracism of entire ethnic groups or specific ideologies, or further attempts that make education inaccessible to the many, the ongoing struggles that occur inside the U.S. are defined by and organically connected to freedom struggles throughout the world.

Iraq: a commentary

> Dr. Barbara Nimri Aziz

Is the United States so self-centered and dependent on gangsterism and military prowess that Washington really thought it could bully through any policy it wanted, for as long as it wanted? International coolness to America's call to sanction Iran was surely the signal that a limit had been reached.

It is difficult to imagine that the United States did not anticipate the current confrontation with Iraq, and thereby avoid a great deal of embarrassment. Not only is Washington unable to bully other countries into towing the American line as it did in 1991. It simply fails to understand the internal dynamics of the region.

Does Washington not realize how mutable the Middle East is, and thereby how Arab nations can change, and even — lord forbid! — overcome enmities and lapses with each other? Did they not notice Iraq strengthening ties with Iran, overcoming differences with Syria, building contacts with Egypt, meeting Gulf state representatives? Did the White House not hear Saudi, Arab Emirate and Egyptian pleas for the embargo to be eased because of the mountain of dead created by sanctions-related food and medical shortages?

Perhaps the perceived callousness of Arabs gives Washington the idea that it can inflict any amount of punishment at Iraq without stirring the Arab people. Well, it seems, Washington was wrong.

Now, it's the callousness of the West which is under scrutiny worldwide. No Arab or Muslim today feels that the U.S. together with Britain has not gone too far with its really stubborn, murderous sanctions policy. People everywhere (but here) can assess the U.S. — world public is no longer fooled. The message they hear is: "Step out of line and this is what you get."

But Baghdad has not relied only on ethical issues and the principle of sovereignty. It has also capitalized on its past economic record in the Middle East. It may be very much weakened today, but Iraq still counts in the context of the regional economy. Lebanon's trade with Iraq before 1982 constituted 60 percent of its commerce. Jordan's economic dependence was probably higher. Turkey also did well in Iraq. Palestinians were recipients of Iraqi largesse.

Washington seems not to notice these things however. It may be too busy watching Saddam's inner circles, trying to find someone who will pull the trigger. Is this the kind of leadership Americans can condone? Is it what they want their taxes to support? Is this the framework they want their foreign affairs experts and battalions of foreign correspondents to work within?

New release from UMass' Hallraker

I'd like to start this week's column by apologizing to the people at the SPACE in Worcester. I think they are doing a great job and I did not mean to single them out in last week's column about their rule on no dancing. The issue of dancing is a sticky one and I understand that the SPACE is trying to dissuade violence, not dancing. Yes, there is a difference. Look for an interview with the people who run the SPACE in the upcoming weeks.

HALLRAKER: The Method of... (Sike Records)

Well it's finally here, and it rocks. When punk started there were no rules or formulas or even precedents for the bands to follow, the bands were just playing fast, angry music. That is why bands like the Sex Pistols, Bad Brains, Black Flag, Minor Threat and the Circle Jerks were so special; they knew that the key ingredient was playing raw aggressive music. While punk and hardcore are still exciting, too many bands revert to formulas (many of which are amazing) and end up sounding stale. There have been a couple of exceptions like Swiz and Kiss It Goodbye and now Hallraker.

Hallraker consists of Jim Belisle on vocals, Jim Pion on guitar, Jim Shea on bass and Chris Bevalaqua on drums, are trying to make something that is loud and furious. When you start listening to The Method Of..., you notice that each song, while short, is trying to pack as much as it possibly can before it ends.

The CD starts off with "Small Sunshine," a rocking but Swiz influenced number — after that the blatant comparisons end. The CD then proceeds to cut through you like a buzzsaw, never allowing you to catch your breath. The second track, "Concrete," lulls you with its catchy intro before pummeling you. "Hometown-Heroes," one of the best songs on this album, is about growing up in a town that you do not fit into. When Belisle screams "All I know is what I'll never be I can live with what I'll never be and I can die with what's inside of me and I can hate as far as you can see," he is more than convincing.

There is no doubt that Hallraker is an angry band, but unlike most bands today, they are angry at the status quo. "Twenty On One," a song that questions gang mentality and asks if you're really tough if you only fight when the numbers are in your favor. On "American Bandscam" they lament the ideology of major labels exploiting bands to sell records. Like Black Flag, Hallraker sees what's wrong with society and the people in all scenes, and they are speaking out against it. On "Machinery," another song off the demo and my favorite song, is a battle cry as this band proclaims they're right to offend you.

Hallraker is not a band going quietly into the night; they are going to fight every step of the way in order to achieve their goals. They admit it won't be easy on "Launchramp," — "live and learn this fact of life we fall we die sometimes when it all just seems so real we run we hide this time around will be mine," Hallraker, like most of us, knows life isn't easy, but they also know that is part of what makes it worth living. I promise you, Hallraker will rock your world, because they are not trying to meet a standard other then their own and they know sometimes the only way to make it in this world is to fight. A

This weekend in Greenough on Friday night, Tipping Canoe, NewJerseyFairPlqn and Six Going On Seven will be playing. On Sunday, Converge, Fall In, Gandiva and 40 Days Rain will be playing at the SPACE.

A nice mix of comedy and safe sex

By Alex Iglesias
Collegian Staff

They are known as the "Not Ready For Bedtime Players"—— an improv group. One could say they are present day crusaders, on a mission across campus to educate the lives of their fellow student body. But how can an improv group educate, if they're only a comedy act?

"It's a great way to hear about these issues without being lectured by adults," said junior psychology major Gina Bognanno.

The truth is that these 10 "sex-crazed" comedians have more to offer than just a few laughs. Every Wednesday night the group performs their 20-skit show. Led by company manager, Mike Harrigan, the "sex troop" makes appearances all across the University of Massachusetts. Each performance, the group rides in with only one practice a week, but is still winning praise from the audience.

"It was the most orgasmically informative show I've ever seen," said senior linguistics major Tommy Mangam.

These campus crusaders are what many consider to be peer educators. Forget your sex education seminars of the past, the "Bedtime Players" have a lot more in store for the sexually uneducated mind. It's a lesson on condoms, STDs, alcohol abuse, relationships, homosexuality and domestic violence. In a simple word, it's life. And for many students on the UMass campus, "it is a reality," Harrigan said.

At times, many of the skits have been written by students who have faced some of these daunting realities. In a paralyzing skit performed by Brian Burns each week, the day is still to come when the audience hasn't cried. In his five minute monologue about his trials with the AIDS virus, Burns rips out the hearts of his audience, while still managing to capture a glimpse of hope in his marked days.

Yet the show isn't entirely an hour and a half of sorrow. Behind some of the more tragic stories, the "hormone raging" members display some of the most hilarious and, at times, shocking antics. It is one of those shows that has the audience saying, "I can't believe they did that," while still finding it somewhat intriguing. Perhaps the reason being is the all out lesbian encounter demonstrating dental dams, in the appropriately titled skit, "Taste Test." Or maybe it was even the clever-ish mnemonics such as "Yetta Yeast" or "Henry Herpes."

Either way it is no holds bar for the zany group of sex educators. As always, their mission is simple and very sincere. They want to teach you, make you laugh as much as they can, and hopefully make at least a smidgen of a dent.

"I'm really glad to be doing this because it educates people. As the date rapist which I play, I hope my impact will reduce the amount of rapes which occur," said cast member Rob McDonald.

"Everyone who writes us back any feedback, is always a victory," said cast member Patti Lynott.

ALEX IGLESIAS / COLLEGIAN

The Not Ready For Bedtime Players offers a unique blend of comedy mixed with important issues concerning sex education.

eled to Virginia for the game? And, on one day's notice as well.

Love that NCAA Tournament committee...

• And for the No. 20 women's soccer team, that love could not be more tangible than a NCAA first round rematch with No. 17 Harvard last weekend — at Ohiri Field in Cambridge of all places.

Uh, what? Now, let's take a deep breath...

So, a team that plays a lesser strength of schedule (four opponents made the NCAA's), and loses two games to the top regional teams in No. 5 Connecticut (5-0) and Hartford (2-0) gets home advantage over a side who has a stronger national strength of schedule (six opponents who made the Tournament), while losing a 2-1 nailbiter to UConn.

That's logic for you — damn, Socrates must be rolling over in his grave.

Both the Crimson and the Minutewomen had to deal with significant personnel losses this season, and in a legitimate tearjerker, last year's National Player of the Year finalist Emily Stauffer did not play for Harvard due to her brother's bout with leukemia, while UMass had six starters graduate.

Um, yeah — no Homer-istic sentiments, but that is also just a little slanted to the Minutewoman's side.

But all kneejerk sentiments aside, the 2-0 loss to the Crimson last Sunday afternoon hurt in more ways than one.

While a rebuilding season evolved into a 17-4 mark going into NCAA's; with three players breaking the 30-point barrier for the first time in school history; and conference dominance being restored in their third A-10 title; all that was secondary to the fact the team did not advance to the second round of the NCAA's for the first time since 1991.

Never mind the initial NCAA committee screw up, UMass would still have hosted George Mason in the first Sweet 16 match held in Amherst since 1993. On top of that, the success of 1993's Final Four squad helped inspire me to cover the team the past two years.

Isn't it strange how the circle becomes complete, even in a dark hour? My final fall season was hell in a bucket, but hey, at least I enjoyed the ride...

In the beginning of the year, I picked Washington to win the national title.

And they tried. Real hard.

But after this week's loss to UCLA (a game they tried really hard to win), the Huskies now have three losses.

But hey, they've won seven, right? It's not so bad, I guess.

The way I see it, Washington will win about 80 percent of the games I thought they would. In baseball, if you bat .800, you'd be the best player ever. Right?

So in a way, it was a great pick. Great picks make me happy and fuzzy inside.

Puffy cloud ranking — 8 (Because we all feel good).

Uncle Bill's Line of the Week...

Uncle Bill e-mailed me, but I can't find it. My guess is he would have said, "Washington tries real hard, Luke. Be nice to them in the paper."

Uncle Bill puffy cloud ranking — 10.

I guess that means we're all happy now.

getting better. The key for us a team is to be calm, yet intense."

Among those serving as an inspiration to Meyers was her high school coach Cami Ciarelli, who played the game professionally before becoming a coach, and Dionne Nash, a teammate of her's last season.

"Coach always worked hard," Myers said. "Last year, I thought Dionne Nash really stepped it up. She just made up her mind to stop struggling. As far as this year, I think [freshman outside hitter] Lymarie Llovet's worked hard as well as Lesley.

"I know, and the rest of us know, that we'll have to step it up next season. I know there's going to be pressure on us, but we're not going to let up. My mindset is to get the ball and be confident with it."

A Healthy Investment in Your Future
Health Care. Those two words have been the source of much discussion recently. Probably because we as a nation know the importance of investing in a healthy future.
So do millions of patients who choose chiropractic as their preferred source of health care. The chiropractic beliefs in fitness, nutrition, prevention, and natural maintenance make good sense.
Wellness, you see, is the normal state of being.
New York State government agrees. They have recently passed the Insurance Equality bill that mandates insurance coverage for chiropractic care.
For over 75 years, New York Chiropractic College has upheld a tradition of excellence in chiropractic higher education. Our combined traditions, old and new, have built the base from which the chiropractic doctors of the future are created.
Choose New York Chiropractic College. A healthy investment for today and tomorrow.

Fall season falls apart for '97 UMass teams

It's all over... almost (ex: check bottom of page).

With regrets and resignation, I have begun to bid my last fall sports season here at the Collegian good-bye, and I would say this has been the most interesting one of all.

Four years — damn.

Jorma Kansanen

And like a drunk uncle, winter dropped a heavy load on our proverbial couch last weekend.

Not only did the first snow of the season provide a less- than-cheery welcome to the winter, and not-mentioning Rebecca Donaghue's fall from grace in her NCAA cross country qualifier, three of our fall sports suffered bone- chilling losses. After snow on Friday, it poured on Saturday for the Massachusetts football team:

• In the larger scheme of UMass life, the resignation of coach Mike Hodges actually can be considered a good thing.

When I started here, the memories of Yankee Conference championships were still fresh. However, the once-storied program had evolved into a static and stationary state of non-existence the past few seasons, and while teams like Boston University chose options like total dissolution in the face of financial hardship, something just had to be done.

But, as I took my little-less-than-focused photos at the post-game press conference last Saturday — after a 49-16 defeat to Connecticut of all teams (you know, our arch rival) — I could not help but feel sorry for Hodges. He is legitimately one of the classiest guys in the Athletic Department, and to have the weight of a faltering program with a budget of approximately 1.9 million a year on your shoulders can actually be considered a bad thing.

Simply put, the burden of both the past and the present was too much for Hodges. With the inevitable jump to Div. I-A on the horizon, the posturing he would have had to do to court administration, alumni and — most important of all — the Faculty Senate, is not a job for a nice guy.

Nice guys finish last, right? And with a 2-9 record, that was certainly the case this season for the football team.

Good luck on the links, coach.

• With the loss of All-Everything Kyle Rothenberger to graduation, and the departure of coach Pam Hixon to the U.S. National Team, great things were not expected out of the No. 16 field hockey team this season. Granted, the team had a solid senior class, received a top facility in renovated Garber Field, and former Iowa coach Patty Shea was as good a replacement for Hixon as anybody. But, still...

Those suspicions were confirmed as the Minutewomen stumbled out of the gate, starting the season with a 5-7 record. But that lack of success would not last, and as soon as the season was written off, UMass came through with three wins over nationally ranked opponents (then-No. 9 Ball State, No. 10 Syracuse and No. 8 Providence).

All that talk was out the window, and a door of opportunity for the Minutewomen to grab their 15th NCAA Tournament appearance began to slowly open. That automatic ticket/bid to the holy land of collegiate endeavor was through their conference tournament, and home sweet home was the place for their 3-1 win in the A-10 final over No. 11 West Chester.

As the history of the program began to percolate into my mind, hopes were high for NCAA success, but the oh-so knowledgeable NCAA committee informed UMass they would not stay in their region in the first round. The decision came down a day before they had to travel — and it was against Penn State at Virginia in the first round.

From word of mouth alone, we in the Campus Center basement found out that one of our NCAA participants this fall did perform well against the Nittany Lions, but fell 5-3.

Gee, I guess that hurt. But, how would we know when a grand total of probably a dozen or so fans trav-

Twenty-five reasons to watch NCAA basketball this year

The season is young, and most fans are still in somewhat of a layover period that bridges the football and basketball gaps. Can't quite get into the early college hoop action? Well, we're here to help.

Twenty-five reasons to watch college basketball this year — (Why 25? Because that's all that will fit).

1. To see what life is like after Dean Smith.

2. To see if Arizona both, a) deserves its No. 1 preseason ranking, and b) can repeat as NCAA champion.

3. Duke's incredible recruiting class — Chris Burgess, Elion Brand, William Avery and Shane Battier.

4. Because Brian Ellerbe may be able to corral and control the talent at Michigan.

5. Valparaiso's Bryce Drew. For the past three years he has made his coach and father Homer look great. This year should be no different.

6. Two words: Raef LaFrentz.

7. Two more words: Antawn Jamison.

8. Illinois State. Coach Kevin Stallings returns 14 players, including marquee power forward Rico Hill. Watch them — the Redbirds won't disappoint.

9. Charles Jones. The Long Island University guard is poised to defend his title as the nation's leading scorer.

10. Because Lester Earl will join an already strong Kansas team in mid-year.

11. Because Lamar Odom could join an already strong Rhode Island team in mid-year.

12. To see Temple's vaunted zone defense and the havoc it wreaks on opponents.

13. Because you never know which Fresno State Bulldog is going to be arrested next.

14. Father-son matchups: Southern California coach Henry Bibby against Arizona point guard Mike Bibby and Kentucky coach Tubby Smith against Georgia guard G.G. Smith.

Don't worry, be happy; negativity is way out, and so is our CFA guru

Negativity brings us all down, and that's why positivity is what I'm all about.

The end of the year is always a time of reflection, and so I say we take time to reflect on the teams that have given their fans a warm, fuzzy feeling inside. Something along the lines of "Purdue won, again? Ohh, that's great."

No negativity this week. All warm, fuzzy clouds. All happy sunshines. All love.

Because dammit, we deserve it.

The Top Eight Puffy, Happy Cloud "Pleasant Surprises" of the Year...

1) Michigan — The Wolverines are always near the top, but Brian Greise answered the quarterback question, and the defense is the best in the country. They still have to face Ohio St., but the Penn St. thrashing proved to the nation that they are for real.

Puffy cloud ranking — 10.

2) Washington State — Right state, wrong team. This was supposed to be Washington's year, but Ryan Leaf and the Cougars have given the eastern half of the state a warm, fuzzy feeling.

Puffy cloud ranking — 9.5

3) UCLA — Another PAC-10 love story. After a decade of disappointment, the Bruins have put together a memorable season, behind a strong year from Skip Hicks and the fulfilled potential of Cade McKnown.

Puffy cloud ranking — 8.5

4) Purdue — A revival in Lafayette. Happy, happy thoughts fill Boilermaker country. See what happens when you throw the football?

Puffy cloud ranking — 8.5

5) Mississippi State — I don't know anything about Mississippi St. Nothing. Starkville, Miss sounds to me like the wrong place to get a flat tire. But they're 7-2, which surprised the hell out of me.

Puffy cloud ranking — 8

6) Kansas State — Rumor has it KSU is the domain of all of Kansas's backward chumps, whereas KU is a bastion of intellectual progress in a sea of corn and truck stops. Maybe, but the Jayhawks have a horrible football team, and Kansas State is 9-1. So at least in one area, KSU dominates Kansas.

Puffy cloud ranking — 8

7) Missouri — The Nebraska game put Mizzou football on the map, and for the first time in a long time, fat alumni and friends of the program will get to spend a week in semi-tropical bowl paradise.

And hey, isn't that what college football is all about?

Puffy cloud ranking — 7

8) Arizona State — For ASU this season, the script read as follows: "Cute run last year, nice Rose Bowl, lose Jake Plummer, slip to 6-5."

Well, they're gonna be in a bowl game again, though not the Rose. Destiny darlings usually don't stay at the top the next year (see: 1993 Phillies). Props to the Sun Devils.

Puffy cloud ranking — 7

Booty Schwag of the Week Award...

The Booty Schwag is usually negative. So we'll have to try even harder than usual right now.

Bear with me.

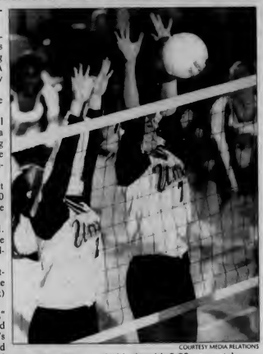
Facing postseason elimination, sophomore hitter Jill Meyers has given volleyball...

Three sides to this season's story

By Jamie Jee
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts volleyball team is heading towards the end of its season this year, although they are praying they will be playing two more weekends instead of one. A lot of people think a postseason berth is a stretch now because the Minutewomen's destiny is out of their hands.

It may not come about, but even head coach Bonnie Kenny has "seen stranger things happen."



However, without sophomore middle blocker Jill Meyers, the Minutewomen might not have even had a chance. With her all-around game — serving, blocking and killing — she has continued to shine through the team's season highs and lows, serving as a refreshing constant.

Meyers knows it may take a miracle for them to make it to Dayton, Ohio, the sight of this year's Atlantic 10 Championship Tournament, but she's confident that she won't be alone in trying to overcome the odds.

"We have a lot of good players," Meyers said. "Sometimes though, I think we're too nice, which may be because of our youth. We have started to work even harder, though, simply because none of us like to lose."

Meyers realizes that their chances of going to the postseason may be slim, but with all but two players (outside hitter Lesley Nolan and middle blocker Michelle Paciorek) returning next year, she can only be optimistic.

"At times we've had some difficulty playing together," Meyers said. "That's one thing we've been working hard on — combining our individual talents for the team's good. We want to show people that we do have pride and with many of the same people coming back next year, I think that's what they'll see.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Leading the team in blocks with 3.80 per match...

"We're going to have to learn to fight and stop feeling sorry for ourselves."

Next year, Meyers will have good company when it comes time for the Minutewomen to dig down and fight. She'll have fellow super-sophomores Kari Hogancamp and Sarah Watters to lead at the outside hitter position as well as five other freshman, including fab-frosh Jennifer Drennan.

Both Meyers and Hogancamp hail from Huntington Beach, Ca., spending this past summer playing together on the sunny western beaches, and perfecting their games. The pair have also had plenty of opportunities to share their constructive criticism on and off the court — being roommates here at UMass.

Hogancamp has had plenty of opportunities to set up Meyers for one of her trademark spikes, as Meyers currently leads the team in kills and is fifth in the A-10 with 3.80 a game. Meyers also leads the team in hitting percentage (fifth in the A-10) and blocks (tenth in the A-10).

Last weekend Myers pounded out 28 more kills and hit for an impressive .500 percentage in the win over Fordham. She also grabbed her 16th double-double of the season, strengthening her bid for A-10 honors.

"I think I've filled in as a leader at times," Meyers said. "When we all know something's missing, I've tried to work hard and provide a good example by being consistent."

Meyers is an All-District 1 and All-A-10 Conference candidate, despite playing in only her second year. A possible addition to her list of honors is an Academic All-America selection, excelling in the classroom with a 3.90 cumulative GPA in her freshman year.

"I've always loved sports," Meyers said. "As I was about to start high school I started to think more and more about volleyball. I played soccer and basketball too, but I gave it all up because this is what I wanted most."

That love for sports runs in the family for Meyers. Her aunt just happens to be Ann Meyers-Drysdale, member of the Basketball Hall of Fame, and her uncle, Dave Meyers, played in the NBA for the Milwaukee Bucks.

"I think I'm lucky to have come from such a tough school [in volleyball]," Meyers said. "I had a friend who was ranked as the No. 2 player in the nation, and I think that made me a lot stronger. I still need to learn more shots, though, especially now that I have a larger responsibility."

But that is what Jill Meyers is all about. No matter how she's playing, she knows there's always room for improvement.

"I think I've gotten stronger which has been key in an ongoing process of improvement," Myers said. "I've also tried to work on my leadership skills and be consistent.

"I'm going to try to accept a leadership role, and I realize that getting frustrated, whether it's with myself or my teammates, doesn't accomplish anything. We all have to work hard and learn to fight."

Meyers knows better than to be naïve about the future, and looks forward to the challenges awaiting her and the team.

"I'm always looking to have a great all-around game," Meyers said. "It's important for me to communicate, and stay relaxed. The more sets I get the more respect there is in the middle which can only lead to our outside hitters

Rain rids city of haze, helps control forest fires

JAKARTA, Indonesia (AP) — It rained heavily in Southeast Asia yesterday, and the skies were virtually free of the choking haze that has endangered the health of millions for several months. "The whole region is clearing," said Wong Teo Suan of Singapore's Meteorological Services. "Whatever remains behind should be doused by rain."

However, firefighters in Indonesia said it could be some time before the monsoon rains extinguish all the forest fires that caused the haze. In the meantime, the government was continuing efforts to produce rain artificially, by cloud seeding, the Jakarta Post newspaper reported.

The number of fires still burning yesterday was not immediately known, because heavy clouds have prevented blocked satellite surveillance, said Kuri Purnamasari, a spokeswoman for Bapedal, the government's environmental monitoring body.

As of the weekend there were still seven major hot spots. But since then, Kuri said, the rainfall has been heavy on Sumatra, Borneo and New Guinea, where fires have been raging since July.

NATION

HIV treatment beneficial for accidental exposure

BOSTON (AP) — Treating doctors and nurses with the drug AZT after accidental on-the-job exposure to the AIDS virus dramatically reduces the risk of infection.

A study conducted by the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention confirms the wisdom of this approach, which is already widely used in hospitals where such exposures occasionally occur. The results also give new ammunition to those who suggest morning-after treatment for people who get exposed to HIV through other means, such as sex or sharing drug equipment.

The risk to health care workers who suffer needle jabs and other exposures to contaminated blood is small. On average, about 0.3 percent of exposures lead to infection.

For many years, hospital personnel routinely took AZT — the oldest AIDS drug — after such accidents.

Data published in today's issue of the New England Journal of Medicine demonstrates just how well this works: it cuts infection by 81 percent.

The CDC has changed its recommendations for post-exposure treatment as new medicines have become available. It now suggests a combination of the drugs AZT and 3TC for lower risk exposures, such as blood splashes. It says those two, plus a protease inhibitor called indinavir, should be taken by workers who are accidentally stuck with HIV-tainted needles.

Campus provides alternatives to drinking

By Julie Siegal & Jonathan Liberty
Collegian Staff

Editor's note: This is the final part of a three-part series concerning the present state of the use and abuse of alcohol within the University of Massachusetts and Amherst communities.

By mid-December, the fate of alcohol consumption at the University of Massachusetts will be decided.

The Board of Trustees, which will make its recommendation to the University, is expected to recommend that each chancellor be given the authority to draw up a specific policy for their respective campus under guidelines established by the Board and the President's Office.

> "We don't want to have policies we can't enforce. That's even worse, because it undermines the credibility of many policies the University has."
> —Tom Robinson

Once the guidelines are given to Chancellor David K. Scott, the current alcohol policy will be re-created. Issues such as enforcement, education and alternatives to drinking will become the focus for the direction of the new policy.

As Scott said, "No one is calling for a ban right now. It's a more reasoned, balanced approach."

Enforcement: a policy within a policy

When Westfield State became a dry campus this fall, new enforcement policies were one of the most vital aspects involved.

At Westfield, first-time alcohol offenders are suspended from campus for five consecutive weekends; are required to perform five hours of community service and have to pay $50 to take an alcohol and drug education class.

Second-time offenders are suspended from housing, while third-time offenders are expelled from the school.

"They're trying to scare you out of drinking," one underage Westfield sophomore female said, "it hasn't solved anything."

According to Scott, the campus might, "look at harsher punishments so people know we are serious about it. Some more severe penalty would kick in earlier."

Sue Pearson, the Chair of the Alcoholic Beverage Task Force, said, "the general consensus that's beginning to emerge is that the current policy, with some modifications, is a reasonable policy which needs better enforcement."

If stricter enforcement becomes a staple of the new policy, increased stress would be placed on resident assistants (RAs). Presently, as stated in the 1997-98 Residence Hall Manual, "the Resident Assistant's role is to: inform students of the Alcoholic Beverage policy," and to "report all violations of the policy to the appropriate University staff."

According to Area Director of Southwest/North Michael Burchell, RAs already have enough difficulty enforcing the current policy.

"I don't believe the residential life staff is in a position to enforce a policy that would be more strictly controlled," Burchell said. "The RA staff has a hard enough time enforcing the alcohol policy as it stands."

"We don't want to have policies we can't enforce," said Tom Robinson, Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs. "That's even worse, because it undermines the credibility of many policies the University has."

Student Government Association (SGA) president Lia Wong acknowledges an alcohol problem on campus, but denies that a stricter alcohol policy will combat abuses.

"It is not appropriate to legislate," Robinson said. "It's impossible to legislate student behavior."

Instead of enforcement and more severe punishments, alternatives to drinking are a vital part of minimizing the amount of alcohol abuse on campus, according to Robinson.

"We need to look at the level of activities on campus and think about how to maximize the resources we have," Robinson said.

> "I certainly think there needs to be more going on, but I think the focus needs to be a concerted effort. Everyone has to support it. There's issues on campus like drinking and people say it's a problem but no one wants to go to the next step."

SGA to honor Rosenberg as its Legislator of the Year

By Victoria Graves

A motion was passed at last night's Student Government Association (SGA) meeting of the Undergraduate Student Senate at the University of Massachusetts to award the SGA "Legislator of the Year" award to Massachusetts Senator Stan Rosenberg.

According to the motion, brought forth by Sen. Jennifer Casasanto (Southwest Area), "Sen. Stan Rosenberg has demonstrated to be a legislator of excellent standing, and... has proven himself to be a dedicated leader to the UMass community and to all the students by advocating for the UMass Budget increase."

"Stan Rosenburg is arguably the most powerful person in the state. Historically, we have honored a legislator... he's a great ally to students and alumni at this University," said Brian Tirrell, Student Trustee.

According to Marc Kenen, staff coordinator for the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA), this is the fifth year that the SGA has given out the award.

Two students were also appointed to the Student Judiciary and sworn in by Senate Speaker Peter Kilbourne.

The motion to appoint Megan DeMariano to the judiciary was ruled dilatory at last week's meeting but was passed last night.

"I'm looking forward to working with the other justices and would appreciate your endorsement," DeMariano, a former SGA senator, said to the senate body.

Laurance Lee was also successfully appointed to the Student Judiciary.

"I want to get involved with the SGA and serve the student body as best as I can... I'm not a politician, I'm interested in legal issues.

SGA President Lia Wong presented the senate with the Executive Cabinet's Legislative Agenda for the current academic year. The agenda addressed 19 points, on which the cabinet is requesting the Senate's support. They include the creation of a Course and Teacher Evaluation (CATE) Guide, support for the reconsideration of using the state logo by the University of Massachusetts and support for the renaming of institution buildings from American presidents to influential Americans.

"The University of Massachusetts should strive to be a place which embraces diversity in all facets," read the agenda.

"I'm a little confused about the president's agenda... some of these

New Iraq solution proposed

By George Gedda
Associated Press

GENEVA — Secretary of State Madeleine Albright rushed to Geneva yesterday for a middle-of-the-night review of a Russian proposal for ending the standoff with Iraq. President Clinton insisted any arrangement must include the return of weapons inspectors.

In Washington, Clinton said anew that the United States wants a peaceful solution to the three-week crisis but that Iraq could set no conditions on the inspectors. "That's our top line, that's our bottom line," he said.

Russian Prime Minister Yevgeny Primakov invited Albright and the foreign ministers of France and Britain to this traditionally neutral city to detail a plan he worked out with Iraqi Foreign Minister Tariq Aziz for resolving the latest crisis in the Persian Gulf.

"A certain program has been worked out that allows us, we think, to avoid... a confrontation, to avoid the use of force and achieve a settlement," he said, refusing to elaborate.

Even as Clinton strengthened American military power in the Gulf, U.S. officials encouraged Russia and France to use their influence with Iraqi President Saddam

Talk focuses on classism

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Correspondent

The first problem is admitting that classism exists in this country, said Linda Stout, author of Bridging the Class Divide, on Tuesday in the keynote address of "Class Intersections," a week long focus on issues of class and classism.

"In this country classism is an invisible force and that makes it much more powerful," Stout said. "Admitting there is classism takes away its power."

Stout is also the Executive Director of the Peace Development Fund. A national foundation whose goal is to fund social justice groups at a grassroots level around the United States.

Stout had early experiences with classism growing up in a low-income family and living in a trailer.

"When I was a little girl, I remember spending hours and hours picking up all the little pieces of trash around our trailer, thinking then people wouldn't call me (white trash) anymore," Stout said.

Stout discussed "invisible walls" that promote classism.

The "wall of language" is discrimination because of the way people speak.

When Stout was speaking at Harvard Law a student got up and told her that if she used correct

Annual discount ski sale starts today

Local ski vendors support University's Ski 'N' Board Club

By Ken Tatro
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts Ski 'N' Board Club will be holding its annual ski sale starting today and continuing until Saturday Nov. 22 in the Student Union Ballroom.

The sale, the 28th of its kind, will include five local ski shops selling over $3 million worth of brand name ski and snowboard equipment as well as winter clothing at discount prices.

"Basically, it's last year's equipment selling cheap," said Jay Yozum, president of the UMass Ski 'N' Board Club.

Also attending the sale will be representatives from area mountains such as Killington, Mt. Tom, Stratton and Mt. Snow, who will be giving out information and selling season passes.

Throughout the sale there will also be hourly giveaways including lift tickets to local mountains, a trip to motions are not in the best interest of the senate and I oppose them," said Sen. Paul Ferro (Commuter Area), referring specifically to renaming institution buildings, and a request to extend the authority of the Student Attorney General.

Tirrell called for the senate body to look at the agenda as a tool to create further legislation.

"We shouldn't always highlight the negative... we should try to build on what's there," Tirrell said.

The senate also voted last night to allocate $1100 to Zeta Psi fraternity for repairs to their building to meet fire code requirements.

originally created to decrease drinking on campus, Tolson said the controversial issue was lodged in the back of his mind as he tried to invent a weekend program to cater to students' needs.

Funded by the Office of the Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs and Auxiliary Services, "Something Every Friday" has been attracting more students every year since its start, Tolson said.

In the past, the free program has offered comedian impressionists, a magic show, a psychic fair this past Halloween, an escape artist, a fire breather and various musical groups. After individual performances, recent movies like Face Off and Air Force One are shown.

The program was "a little slow starting off," according to Tolson, but has approximately doubled since it began three years ago.

Tolson's main goal in creating the program was to offer events that were not already happening on campus.

"We wanted first–run movies for free," Tolson said, "but we tend not to have large (musical) bands because UPC (University Productions and Concerts) already does that."

To make sure the program continues to offer events students would be interested in, Tolson books acts through program magazines, speaking to other universities and entertainment agents.

Friday turnouts prove successful, but Tolson said he thinks the program could do better if it expanded into the residence areas.

The only real problem is the lack of performance space in residence areas, according to Tolson.

"Something Every Friday" hopes to have something every Saturday in the future to further meet students' needs and to replace weekend drinking, but Tolson said a combined effort is needed to mend the alcohol issue on campus.

"I certainly think there needs to be more going on, but I think the focus needs to be a concerted effort," Tolson said. "Everyone has to support it. There's issues on campus like drinking and people say it's a problem but no one wants to go to the next step."

RSOs as alternatives

With the hundreds of RSOs offered on campus, many students do not get involved or are not aware of them due to lack of publicity, according to Amy D'Agostino, president of the Outing Club.

RSOs offer many activities, some of which fall on weekends, but more weekend activities could be offered, D'Agostino said.

The Outing Club offers programs almost every weekend, with fewer winter events due to harsh weather conditions.

Newcomers are strongly urged to join the Outing Club, D'Agostino said, if kayaking, hiking, canoeing, white–water rafting, rock climbing and cross–country skiing are among their interests. The club also takes overnight trips to their cabin in New Hampshire.

To help decrease drinking on campus, more activities and programs should be offered and publicized to the students, D'Agostino said.

"It's a good idea to offer more," she said. "Half the reason why I chose this university is because of everything it offers."

Men's crew club is another RSO

The club members are constantly kept busy with practices six days a week plus occasional double sessions. Races are held on the weekends.

"That's enough to keep people from drinking," said Frank Nocito, who is part of the crew club.

It's also understood that drinking during the racing season is prohibited, Nocito added.

The Crew Club is open to anyone from novice to expert, with approximately 60 people currently involved.

Central is "well"–involved

Central residence area also is involved in trying to control alcohol consumption on campus by offering its Wellness Program.

The program, which began in 1988, focuses on providing a "safe" alcohol and drug–free space, according to Erica Piedade, Residence Director for Baker, Chadbourne and Greenough dormitories.

The "safe" space is currently located on the first and third floors of Greenough dormitory.

Students who have past or current problems with drugs and alcohol are urged to apply to live on the wellness floors, along with students who simply want to live a life without the smell of beer, vomit, trash and marijuana, Piedade said.

The number of students who apply to live on the wellness floors far exceeds the space available, however. Converting all of Greenough to wellness has been considered, Piedade said, but conflicting views about this idea have curbed the process.

"Some people think it's critical (to convert the whole dorm), but others said it's important to have two non– wellness floors so students can see reality, what really happens outside the dorm," Piedade said.

Creating wellness corridors in other residential areas where drinking and drugs are prevalent has also been considered, but failed to get off the ground.

With talk of converting the University of Massachusetts to an alcohol–free or "dry" campus, Piedade said the problem of alcohol consumption on campus will not be solved unless alcohol and drug education accompanies the ban.

"Education is critical," Piedade said. "Especially peer education. That will have a much larger effect."

The issue of alcohol on campus is much more complicated than it appears, according to Piedade. The University already has policies stating students under 21 years old are forbidden to drink on campus, she said.

For policies to work, health education through peer guidance must be implemented, in addition to more alternative weekend activities like late–night movies, gyms that are open overnight, drug–free parties and shuttle buses to transport students to these "after–hours" functions, Piedade said.

Drinking on campus can decrease with the right solutions, she said, but at the same time, students are the ones who will make the final decision.

"The more you clamp down, the more they resist," Piedade said.

Students' reactions to a dry campus

Although an alcohol ban is being considered by the administration and alcohol–free weekend programs currently exist and have proved somewhat productive, students say drinking on campus will never end.

"I don't think the problem would decrease if there were more RSOs," said Ruth Rutman, an undeclared freshman. "People do what they want to do whether there are clubs or not. There will just be more people getting in trouble for it if there's a ban."

An average weekend for Rutman, she said, is attending parties, especially when the weather is warm, renting movies and dining out.

"I've never heard of 'Something Every Friday,'" Rutman said. "But I might go during the winter because it's something to do."

Students might attend programs like "Something Every Friday," but alternative activities would not stop the majority of the student population from drinking, said Stacey Kosloff, a freshman apparel marketing major.

Sophomore communication major Chris Lavigne commutes to campus from Springfield and said he occasionally spends his weekends in Amherst at off–campus parties.

The reason why drinking among students is so popular is because of the freedom students receive living away from home, Lavigne said.

"When you're in high school, (drinking at college) is the thing you hear about the most," Lavigne said.

The freedom of being independent and living without parental rule is the main reason for abundant campus–wide drinking, he added.

Collegian staff members Paul Hayes, Victoria Groves, Leigh Faulkner and Tamar Carroll contributed to this article.

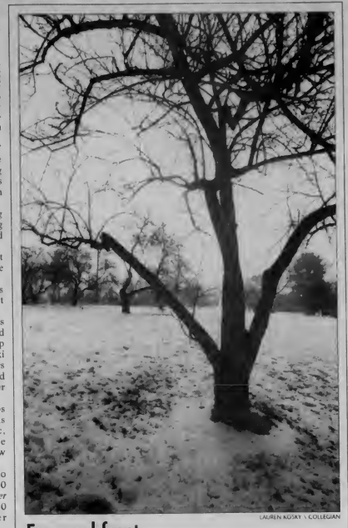
Today, local radio station WHMP–FM will be broadcasting live from the sale from noon until 2 p.m. Then, from 4 to 6 p.m., WPKX–FM will also be broadcasting from the event. Both radio stations will also be participating in giveaways.

Along with the sale the Ski 'N' Board Club will be presenting the movie Dreamer, an extreme skiing and snowboarding film, which is being shown exclusively in Western Massachusetts.

Most of the money raised during the sale will go toward discounting the Ski 'N' Board Club's skiing and snowboarding trips.

"We want to discount student trips to keep things as cheap as we can," Yozura said.



"Learn To Ski and Snowboard," is one of the club's first trips and it takes place on Dec. 13.

For a $25 charge, the trip includes lessons, full–day ski or snowboard rental, mountain pass, round–trip bus ride, breakfast and an apres ski dinner. However, experienced skiers and snowboarders may also attend this trip but their fee will not cover lessons or rentals.

Some of the most popular trips that the Ski 'N' Board Club hosts are its weekend trips to Quebec, Canada. This year includes the Winter Carnival weekend and New Year's Eve weekend.

The ski sale will run from noon to 9 p.m. today and Friday and from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. on Saturday. Dreamer will be shown today at 6, 8 and 10 p.m. in the Campus Center Auditorium.

There will be Ski 'N' Board Club representatives present at the sale to answer any questions relating to memberships or the ski club trips.

grammar she would be better understood. Stout replied that if that student went to where she lived, he would not be understood.

"It's not a matter of saying that my language is right and yours is wrong," Stout said. "It's about not discriminating because of the way someone speaks."

There are "walls of knowledge" because of the differences in education between classes, said Stout. There is this expected knowledge that the working classes who usually received inadequate education lack.

Stout said people would talk of historical events that she hadn't heard of.

"It wasn't until I was much older that I found out about the Japanese internment camps during WWII. The football coach taught history in my high school," Stout said.

"When I tell middle class people I had to drop out of college because the boarding price was raised, they asked me why I didn't apply for more scholarships or go to a cheaper school. I tell them I didn't know I had those options, they weren't open to me," Stout said.

"I define poverty as the lack of options. They [the middle class] do not even understand it is a privilege to have options."

"People just assume everyone has the options to go to college. That if you work hard enough you can have those options," Stout said.

Stout works to organize working class people to get involved in the issues that affect them.

The common perception that "working class people are too busy surviving to get involved in the Union and justice issues is totally inaccurate. If you go to them and tell them what is going on they are very willing to get involved," Stout said.

"But I truly believe working class people are the majority of this country and with allies in middle class people who want change we have a powerful force that cannot be stopped," Stout said.

The talk was part of Class Intersections week which is sponsored by USA/MTA, SEIU/Local 509, The Office of ALANA Affairs, AFSCME/Local 1776, GEO/UAW, The Stonewall Center, Office of Human Relations, Everywoman's Center, Staff Training and Development, Department of Economics, Labor Relations and Research Center, STPEC, Labor/Management Workplace Education Program, Chancellor's Counsel on Community, Diversity, and Social Justice and the Massachusetts Society of Professors.

Albright cut short a trip to India — she already had canceled a stop in Bangladesh — to attend the Geneva meeting.

Blast kills 23 in south India

By Omer Farooq
Associated Press

HYDERABAD, India — A car bomb tore through an Indian film studio's gala kickoff for a new movie yesterday, killing 23 people and injuring 31 among a throng of movie–makers, fans and journalists.

Police suspected the bombing was the work of political rivals of the movie's producer, a lawmaker in Andhra Pradesh state.

The explosive–packed car detonated as hundreds were leaving festivities for the start of filming at D. Rama Naidu studio in Hyderabad, 800 miles south of New Delhi.

It punched a crater six feet wide and two feet deep in the ground outside the studio, spraying flesh, blood and splinters on streets and homes for hundreds of feet around. The death toll was expected to rise as police searched the neighborhood.

A car carrying six television journalists took the brunt of the blast, which blew the vehicle several feet in the air, witnesses said. All six inside the car died.

Hyderabad police chief Ram Pratap Singh said many of the injured lost limbs; seven were in serious condition. The wounded included the movie's star, Mohan Babu, a popular actor in the region's Telegu–language films.

Police found the engine of the car that carried the bomb and identified its owner, a government employee based in Bangalore, 300 miles south of Hyderabad. Police did not say whether they believed the man was linked to the attack.

The doublethink of the '90s

The new spin on trees

Last year the timber industry discovered it couldn't sell salvage logging on federal lands to Congress. But what to call it? Representatives Helen Chenowith and Bob Schaeffer, both from Colorado, finally found an answer. Its name is the "Community Protection and Hazardous Fuels Reduction Act," aimed at eliminating the build-up of the well known hazardous fuel known amongst the uncultured as "trees." More specifically, it's aimed at culling "predominantly" dying timber.

But the best part is in the fine print, where we discover the depth of the timber industry's concern for the environment in these words: "Because of the strong concern for the safety of human life and property and the protection of water quality, air quality and wildlife habitat, a sale... shall not be precluded because the costs of the sale may exceed the revenue derived by the sale." Looks like you gotta go to a Weyerhauser lobbyist to find genuine environmentalism. (H.R. 2458)

The new and improved moon

No longer will the moon be wasted on young lovers if advertisers Gary Betts and Malcolm Green have their way. The two London ad execs have announced plans to turn the moon into a giant billboard. After consulting with NASA scientists, the two believe they have a feasible plan for projecting corporate logos onto the moon's surface using reflected sunlight from two large umbrella shaped mirrors.

In the scientific community, the major debate seems to be over how and not whether to project brand names onto the moon. French scientists have reportedly come up with a cheaper way to get corporate logos into space using reflecting satellites.

Meanwhile, the news agency Reuters treats this as a promotion for the moon, adding that now "the moon could be more than just a part of the solar system." (Reuters, 10/27)

Playboy consciousness in Utah

After making a surprising attack on the moral climate of Salt Lake City, Brigham Young University has been forced to remove four nude statues from an exhibit of the works of Auguste Rodin. Campbell Gray, director of the BYU Museum of Art, refused to display works like Rodin's "The Kiss" displaying the embrace of a naked man and woman because it would disrupt the exhibit. "We have felt," he said, "that the nature of those works are such that the viewer will be concentrating on them in a way that is not good for us."

But would all viewers have the purity of their concentration disrupted by the nudity? Apparently not. In the original AP story, Gray is quoted as saying the decision was complex and reflected not only Mormon religious views, but "the school's interpretation of the moral climate of the surrounding community..." Sounds like a lot of dirty minds out there in Utah. (AP, 10/27)

Writers improve their IQs

Years ago, culture critics commonly bemoaned the fate of authors whose novels became popular and were subsequently bought by Hollywood. They called it "selling out," because the studios would inevitably dilute and emasculate any original literary effort.

But times have changed. With studios now offering millions to buy book by authors like Michael Crichton and John Grisham, an important change has occurred. Warner Brothers producer Denise Di Novi reports that "A lot of authors have gotten smart. They're laying out their books like movies; they're delivering what you need for a movie." That means a lot of short snappy scenes and roles for strong male leads. In fact, the smarter authors build their lead character with one of the half dozen top male stars in mind already (those being Tom Cruise, Harrison Ford, Tom Hanks, Mel Gibson and Brad Pitt). Now there's no problem with independent authors selling out. (New York Times, 10/27)

Microsoft invests in Metaphors

Microsoft has gotten itself in hot water with the government over its practice of threatening computer manufacturers with yanking Windows operating systems from them if they don't include Internet Explorer in their computers.

For the benefit of those of us with I.Q.s under 200, they were kind enough to have one of their English majors come up with a metaphor to explain why their web browser needed to be "fully integrated" with Windows. Here it is: "Ford would not allow one of its dealers to pull the factory installed engine out of a Mustang and substitute a Chevy engine."

So the Internet Explorer is really the "engine" of Windows? Essential to its operation? And with all their billions, Microsoft can only produce this mouse of a metaphor? Just as good is this Microspeak rationale for extending its monopoly: "We're simply preserving the customer experience with the product we've built." If only all companies were as dedicated to preserving important customer experiences... (New York Times, 10/27)

We were all so proud of him.

Anyhoo (and think Mrs. Poole in "The Hogan Family" when you go "any–hoooooooo..."), Ian hears about the weirdest things in his readings, where people who live in our country do things that defy explanation.

There were some great ones, like the guy who was arrested for breaking into a candy machine— in the lobby of a police station — or the guy who jogged off a 200-foot cliff (his wife said he 'zoned out' on runs), or the guy who strapped an F–16 engine to his car and flew into a wall.

Luke Meredith

All very interesting tales. But when I heard this one, I fell off my lawn chair. This was among the nominees for the "Darwin Award," an award handed out to the person who, by their death, does the most to improve the overall gene pool.

All I can think of when I was told this story was "wow." This guy had an interesting day. All while sitting in a lawn chair.

Consider this.

There was a guy who decided he wanted to fly (let's call him "Maverick"), so he attached 40 weather balloons to a lawn chair.

A lawn chair.

Attaches chair to his jeep by tieing lawn chair with string. Cuts string. Figures he'll float a few hundred feet. Brings along a b.b. gun.

The theory? He'll shoot down individual balloons, and float down to safety. Cuts string, starts floating. Within a short period of time, "Maverick" has floated 7,000 feet in the air.

In a lawn chair.

Gust of wind comes. "Maverick" now 11,000 feet in the air. Throws b.b. gun overboard, the thinking being if he shoots down the balloons, he'll fall to his death. (Which, of course, none of us want to see).

"Maverick" has now floated over Los Angeles International Airport, where he's being picked up on radar. Helicopters are sent out to save him, but the wind generated from the propellers keeps pushing him further out to sea.

"Maverick" eventually survives.

There are a few questions that popped in my mind when I heard this.

One. Where do you get 40 weather balloons? Do you walk into Meteorologists Inc. and go, "Uh yes, my name is 'Joe' and I work at The Weather Channel. I need 40 weather balloons for uhhh, stuff."

Pause. Look at new thermometers.

"Hey, are those the new barometers? Yeah, might be in the market for a new one. Cause you know, I work at The Weather Channel."

Two. If you're the guy who picks up "Maverick" on radar, what do you say to your supervisor?

"Ummm sir, there's a guy in a lawn chair with balloons tied to the armrest floating over that last Pan–Am flight."

"A what?"

"A lawn chair, sir."

A lawn chair.

Three. If "Maverick" was bright enough to figure out how to get 11,000 feet in the air while sitting in his lawn chair, how come he wasn't bright enough to figure out it might not be safe to actually fly 11,000 feet in a lawn chair?

And believe it or not, "Maverick" didn't win the Darwin Award. Because he's still alive.

No word on the status of the lawn chair.

Letters to the Editor

Columbia misrepresented in coverage

To the Editor:

I have received with surprise two first–page news articles in The Daily Collegian about my country, Colombia.

It seems that the only purpose of these articles is to create a bad impression of my country. I know that we have a lot of problems, but also we have a lot of good things.

I do not know what your editorial policy is, but I am pretty sure that I do not understand it. Why is it important for your readers to know that in Colombia some journalist was killed in a tiny town far away from the capital? And an American geologist was released? Please take care of big news about Colombia: International trade, political situation, environmental issues, etc.

With your news about Colombia you are making American people believe that we live in constant conflict in every part of our territory, and that is not true.

I do not want to be in the position of a Colombian friend, who was asked by an American after reading your paper: Do you kill everybody in Colombia?

Says Alvarado misunderstands role of Peace Corps

To the Editor:

I feel compelled to respond to some of the issues raised in your article about Elvia Alvarado (Nov. 12). During her presentation on Nov. 10 she expressed criticism of Peace Corps volunteers (PCVs) in her country, saying that "not one Peace Corps worker" had ever offered assistance to her and that organizations like the Peace Corps do not help the Honduran people. I believe these statements unfairly insinuate that PCVs are not doing valuable work, in Honduras and elsewhere, and I would like to clarify for your readers the role of PCVs in developing countries around the world.

PCVs are invited by host government ministries to provide technical assistance that contributes to development at the national level. In this regard, Alvarado is correct in saying that Peace Corps' work is coordinated by the Honduran government. Typical collaboration between host–governments and the Peace Corps involves the identification of the host country's needs, the elaboration of job descriptions and choosing sites for the volunteers. PCVs commit two years of their life to work in a variety of technical sectors (health, education, environmental management, small–business development, etc.) during which time they also become integrated members of their host communities.

I believe Alvarado is incorrect in saying that PCVs "...work only for the bourgeoisie." While I am not personally familiar with Peace Corps activities in Honduras, my seven–year affiliation with the organization (mostly in Africa, as a volunteer and then as a technical trainer) and now as a recruiter here at UMass, has shown me otherwise. Most volunteers I met worked at the "grassroots" level and were committed to the ideals of personal empowerment among the host–country nationals with whom they lived and worked for the purpose of improving people's lives in the long–run and breaking a cycle of dependency that often serves to maintain poverty.

I should add that PCVs, as invitees into their host countries, are prohibited from becoming politically active concerning affairs internal to those countries. While both PCVs and Alvarado are striving to make positive changes in Honduras, their approaches appear to differ. While I personally admire the civil rights work that Alvarado is doing, her approach concerning the highly charged political issue of land reform is one that would preclude PCV involvement.

Pure idiocy

To the Editor:

Everyday I sit down for lunch with a copy of The Collegian to read with my meal. I make it a point to read the editorial section. Yet, there's something fishy I've noticed since I started reading these editorials, they all seem to have one thing in common, they're stupid. I often find myself questioning who's to blame for these moronic editorials, the morons who write them, or the moron who edits them? I figure it must be some combination of the two, but which one I'm not sure. Mostly the editorials I read are just poor attempts at sounding intelligent. Take for instance the editorial I read today, about morality and mayo, what a total piece of crap. Then there's those editorials written by Luke Meredith. Those have to be some of most idiotic pieces I've ever read, they're not funny because he's a good writer, they're funny because he's so stupid. So I suggest to you that instead of publishing poorly written editorials on stupid things like The Promise Keepers, who's [sic] only real amusement value is how bad the editorial is, you publish editorials that are inherently amusing. I've come up with a few suggestions for topic [sic] for which to write about: "Why meat is better than vegetables," "Guns solve problems," "Dogs and God are the keys to a wise life," and "America is going down the shhole because of you, you liberal commie fagot [sic] hippie few bastards." At least if you published editorials like that, I could laugh a clean laugh, not one tinged with the knowledge that my college newspaper publishes editorials for people with an intellect that of a 15 year-old.

Police are victims of obscene injustice

To the Editor:

This letter is in response to Daryle Lamont Jenkins' editorial ("End police brutality now," Nov. 17). Jenkins gives many examples of injustice with police brutality. Although I don't condone police violence, what do you expect.

Police are victims to some of the most obscene cases of injustice and we expect them to be robots and take it on the chin. Who do you think these people are? Ask any officer on the street how many times they arrested the same drunks, wife beaters, drug pushers, thugs, stalkers, murderers, rapists, only to be released back into society. Police officers see this every day, however, we expect them not to get frustrated, angry or mad at this. We seem to forget the simple fact that these police officers put their lives on the line everyday for people who seem ungrateful.

Don't ask me to get upset if some punk gets the back end of a police flashlight because he's giving the officer some lip, or when a drunk driver (pulled over for the seventh time) is treated like a piñata. More than likely, this is the only form of punishment that they will ever receive or remember. If you want to end police violence, give the police a justice system that actually works.

Picture yourself walking to your car and you see some kid breaking into your car and stealing your radio. Would you explain to the person that what he's doing is a crime and he has to wait with you until the police come, or would you kick his ass a little to remind him that stealing is not an accepted form of shopping. If justice doesn't work, crime will thrive and that's what we're seeing in society today. In Singapore, a person is given seven lashes with a rattan cane for vandalizing a car. Now do you really think that kid will ever vandalize a car In Singapore again? I think not. I believe if we instilled this form of punishment into our legal system these forms of punishment will [sic] continue to plague our society.

But until then, remember that police are humans and want the same out of life as we do. They want respect for what they do. And considering all the bull–sh that they see and have to put up with, it's absolutely amazing that we don't have even more police distributing their own form of justice. If you treat an officer with respect, you will receive the same respect right back. And in my opinion, street justice may actually prevent crime.

Recognizing the workers of UMass

It's morning. The sun rises on a sleeping campus. At first glance, the trees and buildings stand alone to greet the waning sunlight. Dew coats row upon row of bicycles, patiently waiting to be unlocked — free once more to zip around Amherst at breakneck speed. Steam swirls from random vents, sharply contrasting the cold air. But for the occasional chirping bird, all is quiet.

Or is it? Throughout the university, people are already up and about. While the vast majority of us are hitting the snooze button for yet another time, dedicated men and women are already well into their work day. By the time even the most eager student is stirring, preparing to face another exciting day of academia, the scent of sizzling bacon and fried potatoes is drifting out of the dining halls, newspapers are being delivered all around the Amherst area, campus stores are hiring their gates and getting ready for the new day, and countless other activities are underway.

When the campus finally comes fully to life, we hardly think twice about these things. As we have so many days before, we take them for granted and hardly imagine that things could be any other way. We waltz into the dining halls, stomachs growling, grab a tray, pile pancakes on our plates, chew, swallow and leave. On the way to class, we hardly notice that despite the walkways having covered to snow the day before, they are now nearly snow-free. Upon sitting down in class, the fact that the room is heated and quite clean considering hundreds of students used it yesterday, is ignored.

The amount of work done each day around UMASS is staggering. But what is more staggering is the amount of it that goes unnoticed by most of us here on campus. Maintainers are responsible for cleaning each and every dormitory every day. The physical plant has to oversee an astounding variety of issues — ranging from electricity to plumbing to heating to air quality. Every call box around the university is monitored by campus police continuously around the clock. Computer technicians not only have to deal with problems that users have but are also responsible for keeping the entire networked system up and operational. To list all of the things done everyday by the workers of UMass would fill several issues of the Collegian. Picture for a moment a university that had no such workers:

Groggy, you roll out of bed and drag yourself down the hall to the bathroom. Limping into a shower, you twist the handle, anticipating a warm and refreshing start to your day, and scream as a freezing stream of water rushes out. Thoroughly, yet unpleasantly, awake, your stomach reminds you that you haven't eaten for 10 hours. You wander down to the dining hall, eagerly anticipating a warm bagel and glass of orange juice, only to the find the door locked and the dining hall dark inside. Puzzled and hungry you shrug your shoulders and decide to head over to the library to get in some early morning studying.

While the library is unlocked and open to the public when you arrive, it seems to be as cold inside as outside. After a few minutes of shivering and rubbing your hands together, you realize that you're not getting any studying done. So you move into the one of the computer labs and decide to polish off a program that's due the next day for your computer science class. Just as you are about to save your file, the whole system suddenly freezes like it had taken your shower earlier. But you don't worry, you'll just ask the lab consultant, who strangely, as panic starts to creep up your spine, is no where to be found.

Fictitious or not, this is a story that would easily be true if not for the hard-working employees on campus. We should stop every once and awhile to appreciate all that they do for us — for they are truly the unsung heroes of UMass.

311, Sugar Ray to play Mullins

By Adam Dlugacz
Collegian Staff

On Monday night, most of you will hopefully be at the Mullins Center enjoying 311 and Sugar Ray in concert. It's perfect that two bands who are devoted to having a good time will be here in time to rescue you from the winter doldrums. Both bands exude fun, and as you wiggle your butt to the fine sounds, you will be witnessing two finely- tuned live acts.

Sugar Ray, hailing from Orange County, Calif. first experienced success with their debut album Lemonade and Brownies— you know, the one with Nicole Eggert on the cover. Despite tours with Cypress Hill and the Sex Pistols and their single "Mean Machine" being embraced by the social critics Beavis and Butthead, they still had not reached the level of fame they were striving for.

Enter 1997 and the release of their follow-up album Floored. While Sugar Ray was still a band relying on muscular riffs derived from years of listening to T.S.O.L., the Dead Kennedy's and Kiss, it was the reggae flavored "Fly" that made them stars. "Fly," which features a guest appearance from dance hall ruler Superfly, was immediately embraced by the radio and MTV and could be considered the song of the summer.

"Fly" represents what Sugar Ray is about — a band made up of five people who just want to rock and have fun. While most bands are still wrapped up in the depression of the grunge era, Sugar Ray envisions life as a giant keg party and they're doing their best to provide the soundtrack for it. Don't mistake "Fly" as a representation of the band. Their other songs rely on driving guitars to keep the dance floor moving.

311 is almost the more mature side of Sugar Ray. While 311 still wants to party and exude the good things in life, they do it with a more restrained and relaxed outlook. If Sugar Ray makes you want to pound a beer and go on a panty raid, 311 makes you want to smoke a spliff and chill out.

311, hailing from Omaha, Neb., first experienced underground success with their debut album Music. Music quickly captured the ears of the skateboarding scene with their combination of Bad Brains riffs with a mellower dub influenced part. Espousing the virtues of cannabis, they scored a minor hit with the infectious "Do You Right." Their follow-up album, Grassroots, showed the band moving in a mellower direction and losing some of their punk influences for more of reggae sound.

1995's self-titled album blew up and pushed 311 onto the forefront of the American music scene. Reverting to the harder sound of Music, the band saw the singles "All Mixed Up," "Don't Stay Home" and "Down" rise to the top of the alternative and mainstream charts. Perhaps signaling the end of the guitar driven angst and depression of Nirvana and Smashing Pumpkins and even Green Day, 311 asked what do you really have to be mad at? Rather then being down about the troubles of the world, 311 sang about appreciating what we have and taking a more optimistic approach to things. Their infectious tunes were the perfect soundtrack for their lyrics and the kids were happy to see a band that didn't make them contemplate suicide.

311 has most recently released Transistor, a 21-track opus merging aspects of dub, hip-hop, funk and punk to fully represent the sound they're striving for. The new album may simply be one of the happiest records ever released as sound effects add a space-like swirl to the sound. The band has not forgotten that they are in a position to do some social service as they attack racism from a unique perspective. Rather than taking the hostile approach that most people do toward racists, they choose to extol the virtues of racial harmony. That is the essence of 311; they are

Why the cocaine rise in women?

Cocaine, once the glamour drug of the '80s, is back with a vengeance. It is no longer limited to the wealthy white-collar class of America. The casual use of cocaine by middle-class teenagers and college-aged students is on the rise. The question we must ask ourselves is why. Why do so many young women choose to use cocaine?

According to The National Clearinghouse for Drug Information, 1.7 to 3.1 percent of all 12- to 17-year-old females were considered cocaine users in 1996. The statistic jumps considerably when regarding females aged 18 to 25, of which anywhere from 7.2 to 10.4 percent were considered cocaine users.

In the years between 1975 and 1994, figures showed that around 4 percent of 18- to 25-year-old females were cocaine users, and about 1 to 2 percent of 12- to 17-year-old females were cocaine users.

It is hard to determine why there has been such a rise in general drug use. It is even harder to determine exactly what lures high school and college-aged women into the realm of cocaine abuse.

To understand the possible reasons why women use the drug, we must first understand how cocaine affects the body. The most obvious effects of cocaine include appetite suppression, increased libido, decreased emotional sensitivity, an increased sense of capability and euphoria. The after-effects include headaches, moodiness and lack of energy. One of cocaine's driving forces is its addictive nature — people want more and more of the drug just to avoid the possible after-effects.

Often, cocaine use (and that of all addictive drugs to an extent) is part of a larger problem in young women — dependency on men. Since cocaine is an expensive drug, many women users find themselves in tight financial binds due to their habit. However, these binds can sometimes be eliminated by involvement in relationships with men. The relationships are not necessarily sexual (though some are, leading to the birth of the term "cocaine whore"). Often, addicted men will support their user friends who happen to be women.

Gloria Steinem claimed that drug-dependent women are "male junkies," defined as "people who need regular shots of male approval and presence, both professionally and personally."

The parents of one 16-year-old cocaine user never understood where their daughter obtained the money needed to sustain a drug habit as large as hers. The young woman admitted that it was a boyfriend and male friends who had introduced her to the drug, as well as sustained her habit. When these friends could no longer support her, she began to deal large quantities of marijuana.

This reliance on men for financial support is an example of how female cocaine users today, like users in the past, often depend on men for their habits.

Meghann Porter

However, we also see that young women today, more independent in many aspects of their lives, are able to self- support their habits, if need be (usually by selling drugs).

There are some disorders commonly seen in many drug- dependent young women. These include agoraphobia (the fear of going outside or leaving one's house), depression and eating disorders. Each of these conditions relate to the user's perception of herself, and/or her life situation.

Author and medical doctor Josette Mondanaro once documented that 80 percent of agoraphobics are women, and 20 percent of these women are chemically dependent. It can be assumed that such women turn to drugs to help handle the stress of being outside their homes, their safe surroundings.

An eating disorder, be it overeating or a case of bulimia, often goes hand in hand with drug use. In these cases, using drugs is a method of furthering the intensity of the weight loss (or gain). Anorexics and bulimics, however, are more likely to use stronger narcotics, such as cocaine or crystal meth, to suppress their appetites and increase motivation levels. Since many amphetamines are legally prescribed, it is easy to see why speed and other "uppers" have become popular drugs among compulsive dieters.

Depression, however, seems to attract a wide range of drug abusers, including alcoholics. One young woman, afflicted with mild depression, admitted to using hallucinogens because they are "the ultimate escape from your problems."

Many other sufferers of depression turn to cocaine to uplift them during a depressive "low." Denise, a seventeen-year- old girl recovering from cocaine addiction and depression, commented, "I used [cocaine] to pick me up...it energized me when nothing else could."

A woman will often turn to drugs when she feels that her social support group is not sufficiently caring for her. This includes many children of drug users, as well as sufferers of the aforementioned disorders.

It is not surprising that many young cocaine users started abusing other drugs at an early age. The pattern of starting out with cigarettes and drinking, leading to marijuana, leading to hallucinogens and finally leading to hard drugs, is prevalent among young female users.

An interesting aspect of cocaine use today is that there are many young people using it on a "casual" basis. Denise commented on the increasing availability of cocaine: "When I first started, I didn't really know anyone who dealt, but now I could name off four or five dealers in my hometown and a bordering town...[cocaine] is definitely available everywhere — cities and small suburbs."

This availability is likely one of the reasons that so many young people have tried cocaine. Denise stated that she knows many of her friends have tried cocaine, and that they will do a few lines at parties to keep them awake and energized. As for her friends who do not use cocaine, she says that none of them have ever confronted her about the issue: "Everyone at a party knows who amongst them uses coke, but it never becomes an issue. When four or five people cram into a closet or bathroom with a mirror, you can't not know what's going on."

For Denise, it was her lack of desire to eat, and subsequent weight loss, that led to her realization that she had a cocaine problem. She said, "I couldn't go through any extended period of time without [cocaine]. Towards the end, I would be blowing lines in the bathroom between classes."

After several attempts at rehab, as well as an arrest for possession of cocaine, Denise finally began the road to recovery.

As Denise explained, there are many young people who are not yet addicted, but who use cocaine when it is readily available or accessible. Many will admit to using cocaine if it is put in front of them, but they do not use it on a daily, weekly, or even monthly basis. Because of cocaine's tendency to keep a user awake, it has become a sort of party drug.

However, the sad reality is that more and more young women are becoming addicted. With cocaine's increased availability, as well as the low self-esteem apparent in many young women, addictions will probably continue to rise. As Denise put it, "you never think you're going to be addicted —it just sort of happens."

Um, hi.

It would be really cool if you females out there would come by and tell me you want to write for the Women's Issues page. See, I need writers, and I want all kinds of girls to feel welcome to speak up on most anything that concerns them/us. OK? So come down to the Collegian office in the Campus Center basement or drop me a note. Thanks. You'll be happy you did. Love,

Boys, outta my way please

Have you ever noticed the small differences that pervade the daily life of a woman? The nuances of social interaction, the ways we are expected to behave in the presence of men (boys) all day?

Believe me, these rules of social interaction and "etiquette" are quite different from those a man is expected to endure, and they are really beginning to irritate me.

About 10 minutes ago, I was leaving the graduate tower after my math class. I was approaching the exit doors and a guy had just walked through those doors towards me. He was directly in my path.

He continued walking straight toward me, assuming I would move, of course. He looked right into my eyes the entire time, seeming to be challenging me.

Geez, what do you know! I didn't move. We stared icily at each other during this duel of "who will move it first" (or "who will give in first"). It was a full-fledged battle of honor and bravery.

Laura Barcella

At the last moment, before we would have collided, he stepped out of the way, still glaring at me with hateful, macho-lovin' eyes.

Oh, pardon me, sir (who appeared to be my age)! I guess I was supposed to scamper quickly out of your way with a giggle and a high-pitched apology? I certainly wasn't supposed to challenge you, or to keep walking along my merry way, just as "oblivious" to your presence as you pretended to be to mine!

So, gals, how often does this type of thing happen to you?

It happens all too often for me. I am sick of being expected to move for some guy, to go out of my way for some guy, to cower from some guy, to apologize for nothing to some guy. So I don't. I don't cower away from anybody, and I rarely apologize when I "get in someone's way."

Maybe this makes me a rude, impolite bitch (gasp! there's that ugly word!), but I do not care.

I mean, really, whose "way" is it in the first place? Why is it naturally his way and not my way? Why should any "way" belong to you rather than to me?

God, guys, get out of my way, if you please! Go right ahead and scamper, dart, giggle and apologize to me in cute, squeaky voices!

Maybe it would make up for all those times you shot me evil, red-eyed glares when I didn't perform such petty, humiliating gestures for you.

To shatter the "glass ceiling"

It can be quite disconcerting to know that I am going through all these tests, writing all these papers, spending endless late nights trying to keep up with the homework, only to find that once I have my diploma, I may not be making the same money as a man.

It is frustrating to know that in 1996, full-time working women were only making 75 percent of men's median pay, according to the Bureau of Statistics. It is frustrating to know that with a college degree, I may still be making about as much as a man with only a high school degree. The question that lingers in my mind is "why?"

Kelly Parent

In an article in a 1995 New York Times, Marie C. Wilson, president of the Ms. Foundation for Women, was quoted as saying, "Historically, when women start to dominate the field, the pay goes down and the prestige will go down, in particular where many of those women are non-white."

When a woman wants to advance in her career, we hear that she "slept her way to the top," or she must be a "bitch."

Unfortunately, even in this day and age, in the public view, the woman's job is still at home parenting. No one could be more aware of this biased view than the mother of Matthew Eappen, the child who died in the recent, well-known "au pair" case. The child's mother received a great deal of criticism, and much of the blame, for leaving her child at home in the first place. The father, of course, is not the one being criticized for not sacrificing his work to stay home with the child.

It's disturbing, isn't it? Well, it should just make us more determined to shatter that "Glass Ceiling" we are constantly being drilled about, because progress is being made at a turtle's pace.

When my mother was starting out at my age, it didn't matter what kind of degree a woman had. Most women had to start out as a secretary, or in some other stereotypical "woman's position." The problem now is usually higher up on the job ladder, and that's where we must make more of a difference. We just want to prove ourselves as equals, and be treated that way.

War agianst breast cancer continues

By Laura Barcella
Collegian Staff

Breast Cancer Awareness Month (October) may be over, but the battle against breast cancer continues year round.

On Thursday, Nov. 13, members of Alpha Delta Phi fraternity and Peer Pals participated in a campus-wide Breast Cancer Awareness Day in memory of Allison Lesofsky. Lesofsky died of breast cancer this past October at the age of 30.

The purpose of the day's events was to raise awareness of the disease and its effects on young women. Through the distribution of information in the Campus Center, as well as informal discussions on Nov. 13, over 700 local women received information about breast cancer and how to conduct a breast self-exam.

The event was organized by UMass student Brandee Helbrick in conjunction with the American Cancer Society, who provided all printed material.

Helbrick, a graduating senior, explained why she coordinated the day's events: "Allison Lesofsky was one of my friends who died of breast cancer at the age of 30. She left two children behind... We always hear that breast cancer affects women 40 and older, but people under 40 die of breast cancer every day."

When asked why she focused the Awareness Day on UMass women, Helbrick said, "By targeting the college community, if we get people now, we might be able to nip [breast cancer] in the bud."

Helbrick asserted that it is important for young women to realize that breast cancer is not something which only affects older women, and that early detection can lead to cure.

"Breast cancer affects younger women, but there isn't a lot of information out there to let us know that... Those under 40 could recognize it early enough [to treat it], but they might not," said Helbrick.

As well as organizing last week's Breast Cancer Awareness Day events, Helbrick is the founder of Peer Pals, a group which discusses learning disabilities and their effects on people.

One in eight women will be diagnosed with breast cancer at some point in their lives, and a woman dies of breast cancer every 12 minutes. Early detection, however, is the key to survival.

The American Cancer Society currently recommends that women of all ages practice monthly breast exams, and that those over 40 should receive mammograms once a year. Women under the age of 40 who have a history of breast cancer in their families should receive mammograms on a regular basis.

Protection for women not far away

"Just leave him," your friend says.

"You can move back home with us," your mother tells you.

"Why is it so hard to just walk away? I won't let him hurt you again," your brother reassures.

But you know within your heart and soul that it's not that easy. The man that you plan to marry can be so kind at times that you think it could make up for the bad times when he has hurt you.

Kelly Parent

But you also know something else. This man that you lay next to at night has given you his own reassurances. He has told you that you belong to him and no one else. That he will find you if you try to leave him. That he will hurt you if you try to leave him.

What can you do? You know you must leave before the beatings get worse, before he punches you or slams you against the wall.

According to the FBI Uniform Crime Reports, every 15 seconds a woman is beaten by her husband or boyfriend. While you read these sentences, two or three women have been beaten.

The fact is that we all know at least one person, if not at school or work, then personally, who has been affected by domestic violence. Domestic violence knows no prejudice. It affects women despite race, class, religion and socioeconomic status. What is a woman supposed to do when she feels trapped in a relationship and she has literally nowhere to go, especially if she has children?

In these battered relationships, over 50 percent of the abuse involves children. In addition, 63 percent of young men (between the ages of 11 and 20) who are serving time for homicide have killed their mothers' abusers.

Women are five times more likely to be killed by their husbands during separation than after divorce. The statistics of women being killed by their husbands have gone up, from a woman being killed by her batterer every 22 days in 1990, to a woman being killed by her batterer every eight days in 1994 (Massachusetts Department of Public Health).

What do all these facts and statistics tell us? What do they tell the women who want to leave?

Fortunately, there is a shelter in nearby Holyoke that was designed to help women, and to give women a place to go. It is the Womanshelter/Companeras Program, and its location is secret to protect women and children from their abusers.

The Womanshelter/Companeras, started in 1980, is a non- profit organization run by volunteers, as well as a daily staff of 12, to provide emergency shelter and services for battered women and children. To date, these dedicated workers have helped approximately 20,000 women.

The organization also offers support and outreach groups, childcare programs, community education and a legal assistance program named LEAP. LEAP, the Legal Emergency Assistance Program, was created to assist women in filing restraining orders, getting accompaniment into court proceedings and information on planning safety. As a first step to getting help, they also offer a 24-hour confidential hotline.

How You Can Help:

The Womanshelter/Companeras is having its sixth annual Spirit of Auction Benefit on Dec. 3 at the Yankee Pedlar Route 5 (Northampton Street) in Holyoke, at 6:30 p.m. The tickets cost $5. There will be a live auction as well as a silent auction, in which people can bid at their own leisure. Many businesses have generously donated gifts, including computers, gift certificates and an airline trip. Guests can also win money in a 50/50 raffle.

All are invited, and the fundraiser's proceeds go to the Womanshelter/Companeras program. Information will be given about the shelter and its programs, including the volunteer program. If you would like information about the organization, or if you wish to have a speaker for your organization, call 538-9717.

If you or someone you know is a victim of abuse, call (413) 536-1628.

Why more boys should be feminists

I think the best thing that could happen for women right now is if men would learn more about women's issues. If more men learned of the challenges that women face today, they could help make changes that would increase women's rights in the long run.

Chrissy Brown

Women already know of all the issues that make their lives harder. They've experienced double standards, salary differences, "glass ceilings" and the expectations to be pretty, thin and successful. Most guys I know are pretty liberal, and they understand about these and other issues that affect women. I know some male feminists, and I think this is the coolest thing to see. Men need to be feminists and support women in gaining equal status in society.

Women speaking up about gender inequality is not a new thing. Since the beginning of the women's suffrage movement in the 1920s women have been fighting actively for equal status in society. Although we have come a long way from those early accomplishments, there is much more that needs to be done.

The first step in creating a social change is to question the present state of society. I hope that people didn't have to think too hard back then to realize it was unfair that women couldn't vote. Even though it's obvious to us now that women are "smart" enough to vote, in those times, society was dominated by the attitude that women couldn't make this type of decision or take such an action.

The men and women who fought for women's suffrage made it happen by liberating people from some of their old ideas of gender roles. With persistent dedication, these fighters wrote articles, gave speeches and rallied people to think intelligently about the state of society and shouldn't have to be a woman to care about women's issues. The struggles that women face affect the rest of society.

A guy should be able to understand that the reason his girlfriend might lack self-esteem is because she doesn't think she can compare to all the images she sees in the media of tall, skinny models who are airbrushed to "perfection." A man should care that his sister isn't earning as much money as a man in the same job, because of her gender. A father should be concerned when his daughter struggles to make it to the top of her company but can't get a promotion because of the "glass ceiling." A husband should realize that his wife may be burned-out because she has been trying to meet society's strict definition of the successful woman: to juggle the demands of being a compassionate mother, a loving wife and a successful career-woman all at once.

Men need to know about the issues that affect women, from the most obvious examples of external forms of sexism, racism, double standards and the like, to internal, subtle issues that destroy silently, such as the need to fulfill the impossible ideals of being successful, sociable, skinny, beautiful, compassionate and so on.

By learning about women's issues — and identifying [feminists — men can be part of the solution. When th issues that primarily involved women begin to involve th other half of society, lasting changes can be made.

Woman thy name is not frailty

If you are woman let me hear you roar.
If you cringe to the sound of defeat let me hear you roar.
If tears fall to your eyes when you must succumb, let me hear you roar.
If you bend in what ever direction the wind blows then reassert yourself of your importance as the givers and takers of life.
There is a voice within each of us that yearns to be echoed
The voice which is muffled inside of you is voiceless unless it reverberates in a passing ear
Let the lessons and warnings of our givers of life be vibrations of encouragement
We all haveth a contribution, make certain yours is repeated for times to come not in mockery but in reverence
Let evil dispel this truth to be told
For it has no good intent,
A voice was borne inside let it roar with almighty wisdom.

Guild shows passion for Dracula

By Emily Trask
Collegian Staff

To kick off their Fall 1997 season, the University of Massachusetts Theater Guild will present The Passion of Dracula. The play, which is a loose adaptation of Bram Stoker's novel Dracula, celebrating its 100th anniversary this year, will run from Nov. 20–22 at 8 p.m.

There will also be a matinee on Nov. 22 at 2 p.m.

Beginning in 1911 England, at the home of Dr. Sedric Seward (which happens to be attached to an insane asylum), the scene is set for horror.

Seward (played by Erik Bergmann) brings two world-renowned doctors to his house in an attempt to help his niece, Wilemenia Murray (Laura Hale), who has contracted a disease which no one can diagnose.

Dr. Van Zandt (Michelle Ouelette), and Professor Van Helsing (Robert Davis), soon arrive on the scene to try and figure out what is wrong with poor Wilemenia.

In the mean time, one of Seward's patients, Mr. Redfield (John Kazlouskas) has fallen under the power of a mysterious figure, who soon makes his grand appearance at the Seward household, leaving everyone wondering who he is. When Dr. Van Helsing begins to suspect the identity of the mysterious stranger, the mayhem begins.

The show, which has taken seven months to come to fruition, "is successful for me because it is an interaction between four basic theatrical elements: acting, special effects, lighting and sound. It is a complicated show, said Producer/Production Manager Ari Teplitz. Being the first show of the season, Teplitz added, "everyone is really excited. We have worked very hard on this show. We want it to be a fantastic experience for all who are involved."

Tickets are $6 for the general public and $4 for students and seniors. For tickets or more information call (413) 545–2511 or 1–800–999–UMAS. The Passion of Dracula is partially funded by a grant from the UMASS Arts Council.

Duran Duran alive and kicking

COURTESY ELLEN VON UNWERTH

Duran Duran, from left, is made up of Nick Rhodes, Simon Le Bon and Warren Cuccurullo.

By Adam Levine
Collegian Staff

Duran Duran will inevitably be forever condemned to the ranks of '80s nostalgia — a label which is not entirely worthy of their innovative brilliance. However, while most of their former colleagues disappeared as '80s trends began to fade in the wake of a new decade, Duran Duran has proved to be more than a pop music memory.

With the release of their eleventh album, the forerunners of the second wind of the British invasion have returned, and for the first time without any of the original three Taylors. Their latest, Medazzaland, is their most accomplished work since 1984's Seven and the Ragged Tiger, and features an updated attitude with extremely recognizable Duran style. Frontman heartthrob Simon LeBon and band founder Nick Rhodes continue their band's perserverence far into the '90s as the only original members. With the help of guitarist Warren Cuccurullo, who teamed up with the band in '93 for The Wedding Album. A new Duran Duran has emerged to proceed into the new millennium.

Although Duran Duran has never succeeded in rekindling their flame to the level at which it once shone, their existence in our current decade is still far from trivial. In fact, The Wedding Album launched Duran Duran into the '90s with their best selling album to date. After a very average collection of cover songs paying tribute to the bands that inspired them, Medazzaland introduces a new sort of concept for Duran Duran, an album which resembles a darker side of these former glam boys. Equipped with a more contemporary attire, including Armani suits and toned-down hair, their new album fcatures an array of international sounds with a focus on technology and friendship, and a cynical look on the world around us as our century comes to a close.

With the electronic intro that blasts its away into the aggressive "Big Bang Generation," the stage has thus been sct for Medazzaland. Incidentally, Duran Duran also kicked off their recent tour at Boston's Orpheum with this same order, featuring Simon entering the stage. the title song intro served as a dramatic entrance. The album's third track (and current single),

Focus on blues & Ann–Margret

Well, with all the jazz I have to talk about over the next month of classes, I'm afraid I'll be talking about basically my last blues disc for this year. So, blues fans, I apologize, I love y'all just as much as I love the music itself.

And who better have we had in this century to bridge the pleasantly ragged folk-blues of the '20s with the '60s revival of folk and blues (out of which the world was awarded the Rolling Stones, Bob Dylan and Eric Clapton) than Mississippi John Hurt? Legend is a collection of spare, quiet acoustic performances of Hurt's own brand of storytelling tunes in a graceful singing style that is its own amongst the bawdiness of other old blues legends.

Probably the most recorded of all blues tunes, "C.C. Rider," especially brings to mind the more melodic blues styles from before electrification. Another standard, "Nobody's Dirty Business" (also recorded as "'Taint Nobody's Business" by most artists) is completely reworked into a rolling style from its usual slow pace. He preludes "Stack–O–Lee" (or "Stagger Lee," whichever spelling you prefer — same subject) with the spoken story of this "bad man, the cruel Stack–o–lee" as he knows it. It's one of those stories that gets passed from blues generation to blues generation. Into the '90s the Grateful Dead were telling it to whole new generations. Legend is indeed a great collection from a master of acoustic Delta blues.

Ah, the young and the restless of the jazz world: saxophonist Javon Jackson's latest Blue Note gem Good People consists of seven tunes exploring the realms of Ornette Coleman's harmolodics concepts at the same time as providing some deep down groove–based jazz. Jackson is accompanied by a fantastic young cast that revolves around drummer Billy Drummond, bassist Peter Washington, organist John Medeski (yes, that Medeski of "...Martin and Wood" fame) and guitarist Fareed Haque. There are special guest spots by former Living Colour guitarist Vernon Reid and percussionist Cyro Baptista.

The title Good People refers to the dedications Jackson makes in his songs. Tony Williams' "Emergency" (done originally by the late, great drummer's fusion group Lifetime) is, of course, dedicated to Williams. Haque puts in a great dirty rock/jazz solo here. Reid and Haque duet with each other while accompanying Jackson in the group's rendition of Carlos Santana's "Flor De Canela," as climactic as most Santana songs get, lending another gracious dedication to a lion that's still roaring.

Since we're on a sort of guitar rock/jazz fusion strain, this would be a great time to introduce the latest release from the dark, experimental mind of bassist/producer/label owner Bill Laswell. His group Arcana combined his fluid fretless bass talents with spacy–techno effects and the fountain of drumming talent that was the soul of the aforementioned Tony Williams. Arc Of The Testimony, recently released on Laswell's productive Axiom label, slides between the more open jazzscapes of "Gone Tomorrow," and "Calling Out The Blue Light" and the thunderous guitar crashes by Buckethead (that's a name there) on "Illuminator" and "Returning." This is '90s jazz/rock fusion at its best!

Blue Note should really focus their attention on the immense arranging talents of Jackson instead of on the crack talent of vocalist Bob Dorough. Sure, he has credentials: he is the creator of "Schoolhouse Rock," which we all grew up with, and he wrote most of the music for that series. However, his vocals climb that ladder to horrid Ethel Merman–type phoniness. If he learned to sing without that annoying Vegas–meets–your cousin's–wedding–band style, maybe he might find his true genius, but for now he ought to concentrate on "Schoolhouse Rock" and not worry

Blasphemy in the comics: another Superman gimmick

Hey comic readers, welcome to another Four Color Commentary, chock full of riveting social discussion and side–splitting wit on the kooky world of comic books. Make sure you keep those e–mails pouring into scribe1974@aol.com. I'm still welcoming opinions on what you think is the greatest comic story ever put to print, so put down that issue of Spawn and get hackin'!

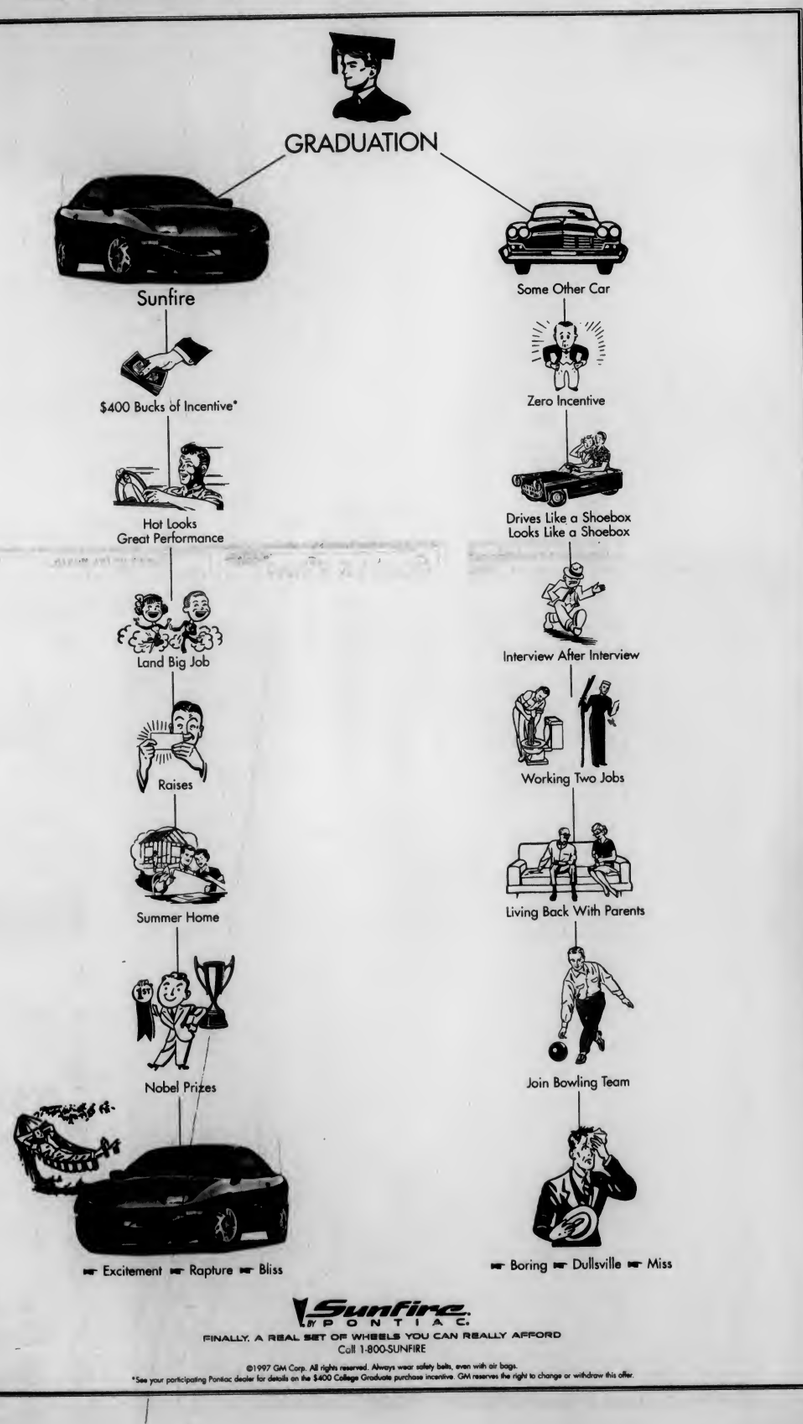
Before we get into this week's big rant, I'm giving myself the "goofball of the week" award for not giving a grade to Uncle Sam #1 in last Thursday's column. If you still care, I gave it a B+. Now, back to our regularly scheduled column:

Back in March, DC did the unthinkable by replacing



Superman's classic red, yellow and blue duds with a splashy electric blue and white "containment suit." Not only that, but his powers were changed as well. Gone was the super– strength, invulnerability, heat and X–ray vision, and his trademark majestic flight. Superman was now billed as the "Man of Energy" because he was essentially transformed into a living bolt of lightning, able to zap himself from place to place in a streak of blue and white electricity. Bullets no longer bounced off his chest, they simply passed through his body as if he were a ghost. Instead of being the Superman we all grew up with an idolized, he was a blue– skinned, spiky–haired, flashy–clothed stranger. The feedback from comic fans and the general public ranged from "he needed the change, he was getting boring," to "Change Superman's costume? Why don't you replace the stars with machine–guns and slap a giant roaring Tiger on the American flag while you're at it!" If you happen to be one of those people who feels changing Superman is like sandblasting the face off of the Statue of Liberty and replacing it with a likeness of Kathie Lee Gifford, be prepared for blasphemy. Next month, there are going to be two Supermen running around.

Yep, you heard me. Two.

In the 64–page Superman Red / Superman Blue special due on store shelves in mid–December, Superman gets spilt up into two separate beings. Both are identical to each other, except one sports the white and blue costume, while the other one wears a red and white version of the crappy disco outfit. Oh, and it gets better. Both men can change into Clark Kent, and the red one? He's a hot–tempered loose cannon who makes decisions the passive, clear thinking Superman Blue finds irresponsible. All this, and it comes packaged in a 3–D cover. Oh, the originality is just oozing off of this project isn't it? And just who is responsible for this atrocity? Nope, it's not the editorial staff at Marvel who brought us the Spider–Man "Clone Saga" (though this has their handiwork written all over it). The answer is Dan Jurgens, and Superman Red / Superman Blue is just more proof that this man doesn't have an original idea left in his head. Yes, the man who killed Superman is trying desperately to recreate something he knew he could never top. Since the "Death of Superman" saga rejuvenated the Man of Steel's sluggish sales and waning popularity in 1993. Jurgens has tried every trick in the book to regain that momentum and get people reading Superman comics again. He's brought back Bizarro and the bottled city of Kandor, he destroyed Metropolis, he put Superman on trial, and he even finally married Clark and Lois. (What's next, bringing back Comet the superhorse?) But what Jurgens fails to understand is that Superman readers don't want gimmicks, they want well-written stories and good artwork. Most importantly, they want Superman in his original costume. It's time to clean house on the Superman line and get some creators involved that truly have respect for the character and will bring some fresh, colorful, yet classic ideas to the Superman world.

The 60th anniversary of Superman in 1998 is the perfect time to return the character to glory and bring in people like Mark Waid, Kurt Busiek, Mike Allred, Alan Moore, Evan Dorkin and Paul Dini to make Superman great again. For me, Superman will always be the rush of adrenaline and the sense of child-like wonder I felt when Christpher Reeve first pulled away his shirt to reveal that huge "S" underneath. Or a timeless, graceful Curt Swan rendering of the Man of Steel breaking apart a chain as bullets bouncing harmlessly off his chest. Superman is an icon. Superman is a legend. Superman is a symbol for justice, for freedom, for the kid who always dreamed of flying in all of us. He can be that way again. Wake up, DC.

Wow, this is a pretty painful column this week. If you thought changing Superman's costume was in bad taste, wait til you hear what Topps has done. They get my "bad taste of the decade" award for their shameless 32-page Princess Diana: Once Upon a Time... special released yesterday. This $3.95, magazine-sized is nothing more than a tacky, greedy, and downright disrespectful attempt by Topps to exploit Diana's tragic death and empty the pockets of her adoring fans. With a sparse script by Dwight Jon Zimmerman cobbled together from years of press releases, and artwork copied directly from photographs of Diana by Brenda Starr creator Claude St. Aubin, this book is a disappointment on all levels. Shame on you Topps.

about making more albums like the recent, flat effort of Right On My Way Home.

For the "Re-issue of the Week" award, we must hand it to the quirky pop-jazz of The Al Hirt Collection. You won't find any names from the Jazz Hall of Fame here (except maybe vibraphonist Red Norvo), but the music on this Razor & Tie re-issue of Hirt's hit singles and the full content of his hip vocal 1964 duet album with then-23-year old Ann-Margret, is too light-hearted and humorous in its '60s schmaltz qualities to not like it. Between Hirt's bouncy instrumentals on trumpet with a mid-sized ensemble, and his low baritone voice singing with Ann-Margret's sensual soprano, it's all just so swingin', cool daddy!

Thanksgiving dinner with the trimmings

Finally, it's on to this week's recipe. It's Thanksgiving time and I have come up with a real cool way to make a stuffed turkey dish in the Dormroom style.

This dish is made with a boneless turkey breast (which you can get in any supermarket). In the past, I have always had a problem with the breast meat coming out too dry, but I found a killer solution: a root beer brine!

Dormroom Gourmet
by Louis Davis

A brine is typically made up of salt, sugar, water and spices and is used to add texture, flavor and moisture to a food before the final cooking (think ham).

Well, I took this idea out for a spin and found that the turkey came out perfect: both extremely flavorful and moist, with a dark, golden crispy exterior. To top it all off, I paired it with a cornbread and sausage stuffing which helps to categorize the meal as pure comfort.

Root Beer Roasted Turkey Breast with a Cornbread and Sausage Stuffing

Ingredients:

- 1 1/2 pounds boneless turkey breast with skin on (Ask the person behind the meat counter to "butterfly" it and pound it out into a big, flat oval about 1/2 inch thick.)
- 1 Tbs. olive oil
- 2 tsp. honey

For brine:

- 1 can root beer (preferably the all natural kind)
- 1 1/2 cups water
- 1/2 cup soy sauce
- 1/4 cup maple
- 3 garlic cloves (crushed, not peeled)
- 1 inch cube of fresh ginger root, roughly chopped (or 2 tsp. powdered)
- 1/2 tsp. red pepper flakes
- 1/2 tsp. liquid smoke
- 1 1/2 Tbs. Salt

For Stuffing:

- 4 cups cornbread dry stuffing mix (or cube up some old store bought cornbread)
- 3/4 lb. breakfast sausage (bulk, not link— or at least out of casings)
- 2 small onions (chopped small)
- 4 cloves garlic (minced)
- 2 stalks celery (chopped small)
- 1 1/2 cups chicken stock (or water)
- 1/4 cup fresh parsley
- 1 Tbs. poultry seasoning
- 2 tsp. white pepper
- salt to taste

Procedure:

1) Place all the brine ingredients in sauce pot and bring to boil. Reduce to simmer and cook for about 10 to 15 minutes. Remove from heat and allow to cool completely.

2) When the brine is cool, combine it with the turkey and store in the refrigerator for a couple hours and up to three days.

3) To make the stuffing, in a large pot over medium heat, start cooking the sausage, breaking it up with a spoon. When it starts to look mostly cooked, add the onions to the pan and cook for about 10 minutes until they are slightly brown.

4) Add garlic and celery and cook for two more minutes. Add the parsley, seasonings and the stock and bring to a boil. As soon as it boils, remove from heat and stir in the stuffing mix or the cubed bread. Make sure it is all incorporated and allow it to cool.

5) Set toaster oven to bake mode and preheat to 350 degrees.

6) Remove turkey from brine and dry off completely with paper towels. Place skin-side down on a cutting board. Place a long mound of the stuffing in a line down the middle of the turkey oval (lengthwise). Make sure that it is tapered so that there is less at the tips. Now fold the right side of turkey over the mound and roll it up like a sleeping bag so that the stuffing is completely encased in the turkey. Make sure that the sink is on the outside. Transfer to a baking dish. The extra stuffing should be placed in an oven-proof bowl and set aside to cook first in the microwave for eight minutes and the under the broiler of the toaster oven right when the turkey comes out.

7) In a small bowl, mix together the oil and honey and rub it on the outside of the turkey. Place the turkey in the oven and bake for an hour.

8) Remove from oven and allow to rest for about 10 minutes. Place on a clean cutting board (don't cross-contaminate) and make 1/2 inch slices with a sharp knife. Serve with a can of cranberry sauce and some green veggies and you've got yourself a casual-mini-Thanksgiving meal hang.

■ Duran Duran

entitled "Electric Barbarella," continues with Medazzaland's explosive beginning featuring a traditional Duran Duran style femme fatale as the song's lead character. The song is inspired by the sci-fi classic Barbarella, which stared Jane Fonda and gave Duran Duran their name. Their stage design at the show also paid homage to these roots, with what appeared to be tin foil used to establish a space- age campy feel.

The remainder of Medazzaland lowers itself by a few octaves but continues nonetheless at a worthy pace. Haunting tracks such as "Out of my Mind" and "Michael You've Got Alot to Answer For" appear as personal testimonies to Simon's friends and loved ones, and are led by a melodic bittersweet sound as a result of Rhodes' musical talent. Other songs such as "So Long Suicide" and "Be My Icon" allow for Cuccurullo's wailing guitars and are kept at a constant fast pace by the uncredited rhythm section. These songs, when played live, take on whole new dimensions, and are equally as fantastic a display of Duran Duran's abilities on stage as well as in the studio.

Last Thursday's show primarily focused on their new material with only a few remembrances of the Duran Duran of the past. Including almost the entire new album, which was a bit excessive, a strange mix of classic songs were displayed, including "Hungry Like the Wolf," "Is Anybody Out There," "Save a Prayer" and "A View To a Kill." Although the band did include an encore, the well known B- side to "New Moon On Monday" entitled "Secret October" and other songs from their earlier years were passed over and numerous people could be heard after the show was over yelling in disgust about their exclusion of "The Reflex."

Although a more well-rounded set of crowd pleasers may have made the night all the better, they played their new material with the relentless effort of proving that they are not just a band from the past, but one of the future.

Tragedy did strike when a slew of technical problems disrupted the show's continuity. Despite a half-hour interruption to fix the broken amp, Simon did attempt to please his impatient audience with the help of the former singer of Missing Persons (a band in which Warren was a member of before joining Duran Duran). While Warren played an a powerless guitar, Simon and his friend sang out to the audience, the fact that the mic wasn't working didn't make for a great number, but his attempt was thoughtful. Right when nothing could get worse, Simon's mic again lost energy in the middle of the encore favorite "Rio." However, this did not stop nearly every member of the sold out audience from singing along as loud as they could, creating a magnificent Rock and Roll experience.

Their studio work along with their live performances prove that Duran Duran will not disappear into the night, but instead, they will keep trying to remain contemporary and innovative. Their persistence seems to be paying off quite well with a new release worthy of an A-.

8–3. The Packers must play all .500 or better teams now to finish out the season, and Tampa Bay certainly has the momentum factor with the Pack losing to the lowly Colts last week and Minnesota getting run over by Barry Sanders in a 38–15 loss to Detroit.

Brett Favre vs. Trent Dilfer makes the call less of a toss– up though. Minnesota gets to visit the surprise New York Jets who are still a game up on the Pats.

• Speaking of Barry, though, he's been like a fine wine as of late — only getting better with age.

He turned in a 108-yard performance last week, the ninth consecutive time he has eclipsed the 100–yard mark. That ties him with Walter Payton for second on the all–time list in that category, with iron man Mareus Allen currently sitting atop it with 11 straight.

He should have no trouble extending that streak as the Lions host the Colts. Despite their upset over the defending champs, their defensive line still looked like Swiss cheese.

• Staying in the NFC, the 49ers beat the Panthers 27–19 last week for their 10th consecutive win. The last time they did that, in 1994, they won the Super Bowl. In downing Carolina, they clinched the division title and the last team to do it as quickly was — yes I have to say it — the 1985 Chicago Bears.

Steve Young should pick apart the Charger secondary this week, although he shouldn't have to do much considering San Diego struggled against Oakland's mediocre defense last week, while facing the best in the league this Sunday.

• John Elway and the Denver Broncos, along with the 49ers, a potential Super Bowl team, took one on the chin, or should I say the foot, from the Kansas City Chiefs. Pete Stoyanovich's 54–yard field goal squeaked through the uprights to lift them over Denver for a 24–22 win despite Terrell Davis's 127 yard rushing performance.

The Raiders travel to Mile–High Stadium to meet the Broncos in the Monday Night Football game this week while the Chiefs visit Seattle, led by the resurgence of Warren Moon and ex–Buckeye Joey Galloway.

Even with last week's loss, the Broncos are still the team to beat in the AFC with a 9–2 record, although K.C. is now just a game behind them in the West at 8–3. A Bronco–49er Super Bowl would be an awesome matchup, although I can't count out either of the current conference champs as of yet.

• Last week, we saw the first tie since 1989 between the Baltimore Ravens and the Philadelphia Eagles, who seemed to don the motto "Refuse to Win".

The Ravens get to host the Arizona Cardinals who are led by rookie quarterback Jake Plummer. Plummer set a rookie record last week throwing for 388 yards on 22–33 passing.

If Raven QB Vinny Testaverde is on, we could definitely see a shootout. The Eagles face Pittsburgh, a team that is tied for the AFC Central lead partly due to the running of "The Bus" Jerome Bettis and the second half heroics of Kordell Stewart.

• The New York Giants still lead in the NFC East, with Dallas and Washington a game behind.

They visit the 'Skins at Jack Kent Cooke Stadium for the Sunday Night game, and will have to find some sort of running game to throw against the weak Washington line if they are to hold that lead.

Picks of the Week: I'm going to be brave this week. I'll take the re–focused Pats over Miami, and for Seattle to upset Kansas City later in the day (you just try to rough up Warren Moon).

Quotes of the Week: It is "quotes" this week because I couldn't pick and choose between these. K.C. LB Derriek Thomas, who became the 15th player to record 100 sacks Sunday, on the tussle he had with Elway: "He wouldn't give it to me. I said, 'John, come on, that's 100. Give me the ball." Note: Elway has been sacked by Thomas 16 times.

Tackle Bruce Armstrong, when asked if the Paradise mosh pit incident would have happened last year under head coach Bill Parcells: "Why, is he a doorman at the club?"

Jamie Jee is a Collegian columnist.

and Colorado's Patriek Roy (553 saves) have faced this season, and that's a good sign for the team.

Don't get me started on Doug Gilmour, and rookie sensation Patrick Elias, who leads the league in game–winning goals. Nice, nice, nice.

• Um, I did not forget about the hiring of Mike Keenan at Vancouver. I'm just trying to not admit it to myself.

When I didn't know jack about Keenan (you know, way back in the good old days of leather helmets and one– toothed smiles?), I actually thought he was a quality coach.

No, no, no. All you Rangers fans just shut up now.

The two reasons why your team won the Stanley Cup were because, 1.) you played the Vancouver Canucks, and 2.) captain Mark Messier.

I judge quality by staying power, and even a nutcase like Scotty Bowman has only coached three teams in the past 20 or so years (Buffalo, Montreal and Detroit). Keenan has bested that mark in only the last decade, and the debacle of St. Louis is indicative of the true coach Keenan is — that is, a nickname of Richard.

Give him a second chance? Talk to Messier on that one.

• I've been hearing a lot about my man Ray Bourque this season, and it hasn't been all good. Boston Globe columnist Kevin Paul Dupont has led the bashing, and I'm trying not to admit it to myself, but he might be right.

No, he's not right.

Even though Ray is not the Ray that we all grew up to love (as a player, man, just as a player), he's still better than half of the defensman out there in the NHL. Yeah, like he would care, but I'm here for you, man.

The Pack look to sack the Cowboys

By Arnie Stapleton
Associated Press

GREEN BAY, Wis. — Forget about that debacle at Indianapolis, the Green Bay Packers are pumped up to face their tormentors, the Dallas Cowboys.

"We always said it would be different if we got them at Lambeau Field," wide receiver Antonio Freeman said. "This Sunday, they'll be here."

The team, the city, the state — heck, fans all across the country — have been waiting for this game since the schedule came out.

T-shirts proclaiming "The Showdown in Titletown" are everywhere. So are tickets, if you're willing to cough up $400, the price of two pieces of newly issued Packers stock.

"It's going to be a special kind of excitement," Freeman said. "Everybody that's a football fan will be watching this game."

The Cowboys have beaten the Packers seven straight times since 1993 — all at Texas Stadium — including three times in the playoffs. The men with the stars on their helmets are making just their second trip to Lambeau Field since Bart Starr beat them in the fabled "Ice Bowl" 30 years ago, and it's their first visit to Green Bay since Oct. 8, 1989.

"All I know is the whole world's been looking forward to this game," free safety Eugene Robinson said.

"This is the game to see who's America's team," said strong safety LeRoy Butler, who never hid his frustration when Carolina beat the Cowboys to reach the NFC championship at Lambeau in January.

Tight end Mark Chmura said the Cowboys represent unfinished business.

"I think a lot of people look at last year and, you know, we beat everybody but Dallas," he said.

Even rookies who have never lost to the hated Cowboys are well aware of the importance of this game, even with back-to-back trips to division co-leaders Minnesota and Tampa Bay following Sunday's showdown.

Top draft pick Ross Verba of Iowa was pulled aside by guard Aaron Taylor and quarterback Brett Favre.

"Brett came up to me earlier this week and said, 'This is bigger than the Iowa-Iowa State game,'" Verba recounted. "So, I really don't need to be told that much more."

The game has been circled on both team's calendars for a long, long time.

"But it has a different flavor than what everybody predicted," Cowboys coach Barry Switzer said.

Because the Cowboys stumbled early, falling to 4-5 before winning their last two, and Green Bay (8-3) was riding high until Sunday, when it scored 38 points and still lost to the worst team in the NFL.

"It's almost comical how people view these games," Packers coach Mike Holmgren said. "At the beginning of the year, they were printing up T-shirts, hats, all that stuff. Then, all of a sudden, both teams are not 11-0 and everyone's in a panic."

Redemption is on Drew Bledsoe's mind

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FOXBORO, Mass. — Drew Bledsoe is itching for his next game after one of the toughest weeks of his NFL career. He must wait until Sunday when the New England Patriots, struggling to stay in the AFC East race, are home against the Miami Dolphins, who share the division lead with the New York Jets.

"When you come off a poor performance one week, it just becomes a situation where you can't wait to get back on the field and prove yourself," said the two-time Pro Bowl quarterback. "It's [yesterday] and I wish we could be playing [today]."

He should be available.

Chances are he won't spend the evening at the Paradise nightclub in Boston as he did last Thursday. That's when he and two teammates took their infamous dive from the stage just three days before his team sank to one of its worst performances in years, a 27-7 loss in Tampa Bay.

The players were questioned by a Boston detective Tuesday in connection with a serious injury to a woman at the club where they went to see the rock group Everclear.

Police said yesterday none of the players would be charged.

Bledsoe is guilty, though, of poor play and a lack of leadership at the central position of the offense. Unless he improves, a season that began with such promise for the quarterback and the defending AFC champions could end without a playoff berth.

"When he's not on. It's hard for us to be on," coach Pete Carroll said. "And when he is on, we can click."

They didn't last Sunday when Bledsoe threw for 117 yards, the fewest since he was a rookie in 1993, and failed to throw a touchdown pass for the first time this season.

He said that was probably his worst game since eighth grade.

"It was just a nightmare performance for us offensively," Bledsoe said. "It really brings you down and (when) you pile it on top of all the other stuff that's going on ... it just compounds it, makes it a bad week."

The Patriots (6-5) won their first four games, while Bledsoe had 12 touchdown passes and three interceptions. Since then, they are 2-3 and he has nine scoring passes and nine interceptions.

Bledsoe, hardly a vocal leader, hasn't rallied his teammates.

"I don't think he's the recognized leader of this team," Carroll said. "He does lead at times but he is not the obvious guy to step into the huddle of the whole team and lead the charge."

That assessment doesn't seem to bother Bledsoe, who recognizes that an impassioned speech "would be outside my personality. It would come across as fake and it wouldn't be effective."

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You will require a great deal of energy to see things through today, so you must be sure to treat your body in the manner it deserves.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — Focus on the intellectual side of arguments today and you'll come to understand that you can talk your way out of almost anything!

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You may be unusually mischievous today, tempted to drop everything and do the first irresponsible thing that comes to mind.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — You will have to communicate clearly and honestly with others today if you want to see your plans come to fruition on schedule.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — Progress today depends upon your ability to trust yourself and others. Once you give someone else a job to do, let him or her do it!

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — You may not have all the information you need to circumvent an anticipated obstacle today. Patience is indeed a virtue at this time.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You have been following the rules lately, but you have not been doing so in a creative and productive manner. Take advantage of loopholes!

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — A friend may advise you to do away with tradition and adopt a new way of doing something. Do not make any hasty decisions.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — You have been waiting for someone else to come through long enough; today, you may have to take the bull by the horns and go it alone.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — It is important that you delegate authority as much as possible today. You will lessen your burden, and encourage others to do good work.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — Take time out from your busy schedule to indulge a loved one in a flight of fancy. Together, you may be able to discover a new romantic outlet.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — You may be receiving the kind of help you don't need at this time. Today, make it clear just what you require, and ask for it directly.

BC flunks out; All hail Hodges

The Beanpot hockey tournament recognizes the best college team in the city of Boston and last year it was won by Boston University. In the age of Title IX, women's hockey has bloomed to the point that a women's Beanpot was awarded to the Huntington Hounds from Northeastern.

After BU dropped its baseball program in 1994, the definition of "Boston" was broadened to include UMass for the baseball Beanpot, and the Minutemen have hopped on the Pike, as opposed to the green line, to win the last two.

As the city's lone Division I–A school, Boston College probably feels it has the best chance of besting cross–town rivals BU, Harvard and Northeastern on the gridiron, but USA Today and this week's Sagarin computer ratings say something else.

Leigh Torbin

Sagarin says...BC is the third best football team in the hub, ranking 94th, behind Northeastern (76) and Harvard (81).

Sagarin also says...The Atlantic 10 isn't too shabby compared to the Big East. Five A–10 teams are rated higher than BC. Until being routed by New Hampshire last week, BU (1–9) was actually ranked ahead of Rutgers. Even after moving up after their loss to Miami, The State University of New Jersey is still ranked behind Rhode Island (2–9) and normal A–10 member Dayton.

Also Prairie View A&M is ranked ahead of both Washington and Florida. Oh, sucker, "Sagarin didn't say." Go to the back of the line you rit–wit. Stand on one leg while you're at it. Sagarin didn't say again, you loser.

• It's always a shame to see the politics that plague so many big time sports seep into the relatively pristine world of hockey, but it's happening again, and has nothing to do with Paul Kariya holding out, refusing an offer of $70 million Disney Dollars from Anaheim.

Speculation abounds that Wilbraham, home of Friendly's as the big sign on the Pike will tell you, is also home to an Olympic casualty. Bill Guerin has proven he can win — taking BC to the NCAA final four, the New Jersey Devils to the Stanley Cup in 1995 and the USA to the gold at the 1996 World Cup — but he might not get a chance in Nagano.

The scrappy forward was mysteriously left off the team, reportedly because of issues stemming from his contract holdout with Los Diablos. So, led by Brett Hull, several American players are mumbling about boycotting the Olympics in support, arguing that issues with an NHL team should not effect standing with the national team.

The Olympics were originally a time when the ancient Greeks would put their political differences aside in the spirit of good–natured competition. We apparently live in a day and age where issues like the Cold War can be resolved, but apparently issues with pro teams are even harder to settle than international incidents in today's culture.

• I would be remiss this week without offering my own tip of the ever–present cap to Mike Hodges. Football coaches can be arrogant, obnoxious SOBs, but Hodges was the eternal antithesis and the embodiment of a great guy.

It isn't easy to walk away from something after 20 years (I assume, I've only been on this Earth for 22 on Saturday) and Hodges did it with as much class and dignity as possible amidst a dismal season. It's often said that Hodges, or anyone, is a great guy, but seldom is it the absolute truth.

He's openly supportive of all UMass teams and the coaches of those teams reciprocate. Hodges has been spotted watching softball games in the rain, (does Tom Osborne do that in nice weather?) Hodges would be spotted at soccer and field hockey games during breaks while in–season. He was everywhere and proudly cheering — seemingly forever.

If you're reading this over a hamburger in the Franklin DC, in the middle of a Psych 101 lecture, or in your JA dorm room high above Southwest, you probably weren't born when Hodges arrived in Amherst. The year was 1978 and Fleetwood Mac and a spry, young Stevie Nicks dominated the air waves for the first time.

Both of Hodges' daughters graduated from UMass, and one of them still works at the school — ensuring that numerous others get their UMass degrees like she did.

Maroon and white is quite literally in the man's bloodstream, and while he admits the program needs a transfusion, he clearly does not. It's quite likely that Athletic Director Bob Marcum will find a position for someone who simply can't afford to let go entirely.

Newly–promoted Associate AD for External Affairs Bill Strickland has been placed in charge of the search committee to find a replacement for Hodges as coach. It's possible Strickland will find a more qualified coach to lead the Minutemen into Division I–A — hopefully.

But, in terms of an all–around person for the job, he can't find a better man.

A–10 has become well–guarded

St. Joseph's Bey & URI's Wheeler lead strong conference backcourt

By Luke Meredith
Collegian Staff

The A–10's rise to the upper crust of conferences can be attributed in part to a recent string of great guards.

This year is no exception.

The A–10 preseason All–Conference teams were announced at the conference's Media Day back on Nov. 6, and four guards were named to the first team: including St. Joseph's senior Rashid Bey, who was also named preseason Player of the Year. Bey led St. Joe's to the Sweet Sixteen last season, where they fell to national finalist Kentucky.

All A–10 First Team

Rashid Bey– senior guard, St. Joseph's

Lenny Brown– junior guard, Xavier

Gary Lumpkin– junior guard, Xavier

Yegor Mescheriakov– junior forward, George Washington

Tyson Wheeler– senior guard, Rhode Island

All A–10 Second Team

Rasheed Brokenborough–junior guard, Temple

Lari Ketner– junior center, Massachusetts

Donnie Carr– sophomore guard, La Salle

Tyrone Weeks– senior forward, Massachusetts

Alexander Koul– senior center, George Washington

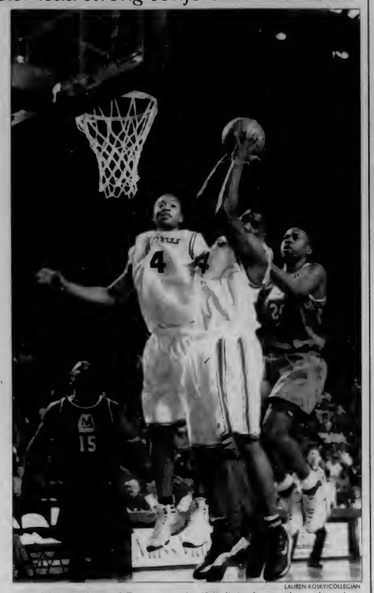
Minutemen nab Clark...

UMass coach Bruiser Flint announced Friday that the Minutemen have received a national letter of intent from 6–5 shooting guard Scott Clark, a senior at Milford Academy.

Clark was named the fifth–best guard at the Nike Camp in Indiana over the summer by Hoop Scoop magazine. Clark has spent the last two summers playing AAU ball with the Boston Basketball Amateur Club [BABC], along with Monty Mack and Jonathan DePina.

"We're very excited Scott has decided to come to UMass," Flint said. "He is a pure two–guard who has great quickness and size. [Clark] plays the game with a lot of emotion and intensity, just the way we play here at UMass. He should be a great fit for our program."

Men's Hoop Notebook



Pre–season accolades...

Mack and DePina are expected to make quite a first impression on the A–10 this season. Both first–year guards — Mack sat out 1997 because of Prop 16 — have been named to the A–10's All–Rookie team.

Great Alaska Shootout...

The Minutemen will get a chance to prove their 1997–1998 motto "Have Game, Will Travel" pretty quickly. After Saturday's midnight opener at Fresno State, UMass travels to Alaska for the Great Alaska Shootout, a tournament they won in 1991. UMass will spend Nov. 26–Nov. 29 in the chilly locale, which includes the likes of North Carolina, UCLA and Purdue.

Massachusetts will open on Wednesday, Nov. 26 against Southwestern Louisiana, followed by a date with either Purdue or Alabama–Birmingham. The Minutemen will play three games, regardless of whether they advance to the finals or not. The semi–final and final rounds will be broadcast on ESPN.

Bitterness? Just say no

I could go on and on about the Patriots' debacle last Sunday. I could comment on how there have been few New England teams that were as totally dominated. I could talk about Drew Bledsoe and his mosh pit incident at an Everclear performance, and how it "didn't affect (his) game." I could explain how Max Lane can open up holes on Thursdays, but not on Sundays.

I could be bitter — but I'm not.

Kicking off Week 13, the Pats host the Dolphins this Sunday, and they'll be looking to knock them off the pace for the AFC East title. I'm going to bet that New England can get more than just a first down in the first half.

Jamie Jee on The NFL

No matter how much more freedom the Pats may have in the post–Parcells era, they know it's time to get their act together. If their previous losses weren't a wake–up call, their embarrasment in Tamba Bay certainly was. Tampa Bay visits 'da Bears — a deceiving 1–10 — who will have to stop a feisty Mike Alstott and a calculating Trent Dilfer.

The Patriot secondary will be tested by Dan Marino's arm who, as we saw Monday night, can still thread the needle. Jimmy Johnson's defense isn't bad, but its not Dallas and the Pats can run on it.

That could take some pressure off Bledsoe, and we know what Drew can do when he's confident.

• Although the AFC East remains interesting, there's a division in that other conference that's stirring up some talk.

Yeah, the NFC Central. There are the defending Super Bowl champions still atop the division, but both the Vikings and the Bucs now own identical records to Green Bay's at

UM athletes honored by USA and region

Some people want to party like it is 1999, but for two members of the Massachusetts softball team, the year 2000 is more on their minds.

This week, junior pitcher Danielle Henderson and senior first baseman Kim Gutridge were selected by USA Softball to a pool of 60 players that will participate in international competitions leading up to the 2000 Olympics in Sydney, Australia.

Massachusetts Notebook

The pool of 60 players will be broken up into three–tiers, with the top tier representing the nucleus of the current national team.

Henderson, who was a third–team All–American, a Women's College World Series All–Tournament selection and the MVP of the NCAA East Regional held here in Amherst last May, was selected to the second tier level.

Gutridge has already played twice at the national level, being a member of the U.S. squad that qualified for the 1998 ISF Women's World Championship and the 1999 Pan–American games this past summer, and was selected to the third tier level.

For Henderson, the culmination of a lifetime of work can evolve over the next two years into a possible spot on the defending gold medal–winning squad.

"I'm thrilled, especially looking at some of the names on the list with me," Henderson said. "It's nerve wracking, but this will help me reach my goal of going down to Australia for the Olympics.

"Now, I feel that I am one step closer and the dream is becoming more real."

• Selections for the Northest Regional All–America team in field hockey were announced this week as well, and by no surprise, UMass was well represented.

The Minutewomen's leading scorer this season, junior Erica Johnston, was selected to the first team, while seniors Sharon Hughes and Amy Ott and junior Kate Putnam were given second team honors.

The first team selection wraps up a stellar season for Johnston, who led the team with 24 goals and three assists for 51 points and was named the MVP of the Atlantic 10 Championship, was selected to the A–10 All–Conference team and was a four–time A–10 Player of the Week.

Hughes and Ott were the rocks of the Minutewoman defense this past season, with Ott being named to her second consecutive A–10 All–Conference team this past season.

For Putnam, this is her third second–team Northeast Regional selection, after being named to All–Conference team for the first time this year.

• Sophomore guard Kelly Van Huisen was named the WHMP/UMass Athlete of the Week at the sports luncheon yesterday, with this being the first time she has received this honor. Van Huisen scored a career–high 24 points, on 9–16 shooting that included a perfect 3–3 from three–point range, in the Minutewomen's 72–47 dismantling of Wagner College in their season opener last Sunday afternoon at the Mullins Center.

A preseason A–10 second team selection, Van Huisen was named to the A–10 All–Rookie team last year. The previous career–high for the native of Haverhill was in UMass' 75–60 win over Korie Hlede and Duquesne, with Van Huisen scoring 21 points in the A–10 quarterfinal win.

The next game for the Minutewomen will be next Tuesday, as they head to Hartford to face the Hawks of said city.

From New Jersey with love: the Devils are at the top of their game

Despite the fact that Newark International Airport scares the hell out of me (especially after my Midnight Express–like experience coming back from England two years ago, but's that another column) and the New Jersey Turnpike is literally a highway of hell, I like the Garden State.

It has an amazing view of the New York City skyline, especially at the break of dawn when the sun shines off of the Twin Towers.

It has Bruce.

It has Jon Bon Jovi...no, I'll have to take back that one.

It has Rutgers...damn, I'll take back that one, too.

But, whatever — they do have the Devils, and I'm a big, big fan. And not just because I picked them as the upset special this season in the Eastern Conference, but because they're a rock solid team.

Jorma Kansanen on The NHL

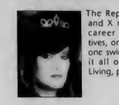
Calling the Arena Formerly Known As Brendan Byrne home, New Jersey has once again made a niche for themselves at the top of the conference. With a 14–5 record, while only being one point behind Philadelphia for the conference lead, the Devils have stuck to their guns this season — defense.

Well, actually to their unlikely gun in All–World goalie Martin Brodeur.

The Montreal native has once again stepped up as the premier goaltender in the NHL, with an outstanding 1.65 GAA and an anemic .930 save percentage. It is appropriate that hockey games are mostly played at night, because this guy is sucking the blood out of opposing offenses.

Get it? Devils — vampires? Aah, just forget about it.

If Brodeur is not the starter for the Olympic team this February in Nagano, then, then, then... I don't know, I'll be mad, but not mad enough to stop watching the Olympics.



But, I digress.

But it is not all Brodeur, and his defense has kept the number of shots allowed on him down. He is not even close to the numbers that Washington's Olaf Kolzig (471 saves)

Burglars make off with $1.7 million in jewels

LONDON (AP) — Two armed robbers stole gems worth roughly $1.7 million in a rooftop raid on a workshop used by Cartier jewelers, police said Thursday.

Scotland Yard said two masked men broke into the fifth floor workshop through a skylight Wednesday evening, threatened two workers with shotguns and tied them up before escaping with a haul of valuables.

There were reports that up to $100 million of finished jewelry, uncut stones and precious metals were stored in the English Art Works space on New Bond Street. But Cartier's managing director, Arnaud Bamberger, estimated that less than $1.7 million in jewelry and gems were taken.

Vendome Luxury Group SA — which owns Cartier — said the stolen jewelry was of no "significant value" and did not belong to clients. The workshop was insured, it said.

Britain's largest recent robberies were a $40 million gold bullion raid from Brinks–Mat in 1983, and a raid several years later on a safe deposit box center opposite Harrods department store that netted robbers $48 million.

Principal suspends 1,200 students

BALTIMORE (AP) — When the principal of a troubled high school ordered students to report to their homerooms to pick up their report cards, hundreds refused and gathered at the front doors, chanting: "Hell, no, we won't go!"

Principal Alice Morgan–Brown suspended 1,200 of Northern High's 1,800 students. She said Thursday's mass suspension was meant to show she's serious about maintaining order.

Parents are outraged. They say the principal and the school are out of control.

And the interim schools chief, Robert Schiller, criticized Morgan–Brown for her action. Yesterday she rescinded the suspensions while Schiller held out the possibility of disciplinary action against her.

"I am disturbed at taking this kind of mass action," he said. Ms. Morgan–Brown ordered the suspensions on Monday — to take effect yesterday — after hundreds of students refused to pick up their report cards at the end of the school day.

Students complained that forcing them back to their homerooms for the last 15 minutes of the day would have forced them to miss their buses home.

The high school in north Baltimore is an area of tidy brick houses and well–kept yards where professional and working–class families live.

Amherst gets parking garage; Kitchell plan approved Wed.

By Paul Hayes
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — Compromise carried the day as a parking garage design was finally chosen at the Amherst Town Meeting on Wednesday night.

An amended form of architect Peter Kitchell's garage plan, created only hours before the Town Meeting began, was approved by a vote of 135–57, which cut close to the two–thirds vote of 128–64 needed for the motion to pass.

The Kitchell plan, which calls for an underground garage, was changed to include the possibility of future upward expansion in the wake of Monday's defeat of the larger Meyer and Meyer architectural firm's garage proposal by a vote of 100–95.

This possibility of expansion is facilitated by the reinforcement of the garage's foundation, in order to support the weight of future parking decks.

According to Kitchell, the compromise was offered to him by Town Meeting members Steve Calcagnino and Alan Root, and they and Town Manager Barry Del Castillo, Select Board member Bryan Harvey, and Alan Peterfreund spent four hours hammering it out.

Del Castillo and the Select Board had originally backed the Meyer plan.

Kitchell said that the compromise maintains his original $4 million project estimate, and preserves his garage's image despite the prospect of an above ground structure.

David Ross, of precinct nine, who entered the parking debate supporting Kitchell's plan, then switched over to supporting the Meyer plan, supports the compromise and said it blows his mind that people would not vote for the compromise plan.

"I can't imagine how we can shoot ourselves in the foot by voting against leaving our options open in the future," Ross asked. "Why rob ourselves of the ability to meet changing times and trends?"

Tom Asher, of precinct eight, said that he felt people were holding onto their garage loyalties like talismen, rather than proposals needing to be massaged and worked on.

Many potential garage opponents were concerned that the garage would take away from Amherst's image.

Yet UMass professor Howard Ziff argued that this was a wrong perception.

"Rising in support of this article, I'm not saying we must bow our heads to the juggernaught of the future, this [compromise] article does the opposite," Ziff said. "[By voting for it] we face the juggernaught of Route 9 and the malls — and we'll do the best we can."

Original Kitchell

Some supporters of the original Kitchell plan, though, felt betrayed by the compromise.

Town Meeting member and former Kitchell supporter Vince O'Connor, angered by the compromise, said that it went beyond the scope of the original plan.

"If an above ground deck is built, the aspects of the Kitchell plan which got public support — such as the park

Alumni pres. "lives" on campus

Goodhue spends two nights in Washington, recalls experience

By Tamar Carroll
Collegian Staff

Alumni Association President Robert Goodhue asked the University of Massachusetts faculty to "tell their stories" to the citizens of the Commonwealth.

Goodhue addressed the Faculty Senate at their meeting yesterday and told them about his experiences living at the University in October.

On Oct. 23–24, Goodhue stayed in Washington Tower and attended classes in order to learn about student life at UMass. He was extremely pleased with what he saw, for the most part, Goodhue said.

"It was a tremendously positive experience," Goodhue said. "I was certainly rejuvenated."

He was especially impressed with the quality of teaching he observed.

"The level of instruction was superb," Goodhue said. "I just want to thank you for the great job you do teaching the students."

However, he was upset to hear that several students had been discouraged from coming to UMass by their high school guidance counselors.

"The only negative thing about my experience brings me to my crusade and that of the Alumni Association," Goodhue said. "Several students told me that their guidance counsellors had expressed disappointment with their choice of school."

Goodhue said it was imperative for the University and the Alumni Association to take proactive measures to challenge the poor perception of the University held by some guidance counsellors and other state residents, especially in Eastern Massachusetts.

"We can and we must change this view," Goodhue said. "Their attitude towards you is born of ignorance."

Goodhue said he is aware of the faculty's many academic accomplishments, but many citizens are not. The solution, Goodhue said, is for the faculty themselves to stress their achievements to leaders and voters in the Commonwealth.

"Write the Speaker of the House [of Representatives], the Senate President and the governor," Goodhue said. "Thank them for their support in recent years, and tell them about your students and your research and their importance to the nation and the world. You'll be surprised by the responses you get."

Goodhue announced the completion of the Alumni Association's first Strategic Action Plan, which he said will augment financial support to faculty and the W.E.B. Du Bois Library.

"Among our primary goals is to increase support of faculty and student programming," Goodhue said.

The Alumni Association plans to give financial awards to faculty for

"Art for a Fair Economy" holds workshop on classism

By Jason Eiseman
Collegian Staff

As part of a week long conference focusing on issues of class and classism, the group "Art for a Fair Economy" held a workshop entitled "In the activist Kitchen; Creatively Cooking Up Trouble," a skills workshop focusing on using artistic and creative ways to alert the public to the growing gap between the have's and the have not's.

"I am disturbed at taking this kind of mass action," he said. Ms. Morgan–Brown ordered the suspensions on Monday — to take effect yesterday — after hundreds of students refused to pick up their report cards at the end of the school day.

Students complained that forcing them back to their homerooms for the last 15 minutes of the day would have forced them to miss their buses home.

The high school in north Baltimore is an area of tidy brick houses and well–kept yards where professional and working–class families live.

Andrew Boyd, Arts and Direct Action Coordinator for United for a Fair Economy, and self–proclaimed minister of culture, led the workshop of what he called "artful activism."

The workshop takes participants through a series of theater exercises, before analytically discussing wealth and the political theater. People who go through the workshop are welcome to join a street performance that will be going on throughout the afternoon today. "It's popular art that's of political use," Boyd said.

"A workshop on how to do theater and cultural events in support of concerns of the growing divide between the wealthy and the rest of the folk," said Jerry Koch–Gonzalez, an alumnus of the School of Education and an Amherst resident who attended the workshop. "It's just another way to help people know about how the rich are getting richer and the rest of us are not," he said.

Boyd uses food metaphors to describe some of the actions of his group, which explains the culinary title of the workshop. He is also the author of the organizing manual for United for a Fair Economy, called "The Activist Cookbook."

With "recipes" such as "3–Minute Meals: A buffet of quick and dirty actions and simple ways to spice up routine events," this book is written to help anyone who wishes to become active in the war against economic inequality.

One of the "cuisine's" Boyd described was called saturation postering. United for a Fair Economy sets up posters on the Internet that people can download, and then organizes several days throughout the year in which groups can get together nationally and saturate an area with posters.

Boyd described the national organization, established in 1994, as a group dedicated to stop the "growing economic divide" between the wealthy and the rest of the people.

Boyd uses the popular arts to alert people to the problem of this economic divide. The Class Acts Theater Troupe, is a part of the Art for a Fair Economy. According to Boyd Class Acts has played at the Ben and Jerry's shareholders meeting, and for the Canadian Labour Congress.

According to a release by United for a Fair Economy advertising the workshop, Martin Hamraty, Organizing and Education Director for the Canadian Labour Congress said, "This workshop gave a whole new meaning to the word, 'theater'. Not only did I discover it was something I personally could do, but I saw how it could be a potent political tool in our organizing work."

Class Acts will play at the Anti–Classism Cabaret Tonight at Bartlett Auditorium, room 65, from 7–9 p.m.

Carey barred from election

By Kevin Galvin
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Four days after Teamsters President Ron Carey was barred from a rerun election, a court–appointed overseer requested a 45–day delay in the election yesterday in order to investigate charges of improper fund raising against challenger James P. Hoffa.

Benetta Mansfield, the interim election officer, told U.S. District Court Judge David Edelstein that if the investigation was not complete at the end of 45 days, she would still be able to set a new timetable for voting.

Nominations for new candidates were due on Dec. 5, but with Carey vowing to appeal and Mansfield under orders to investigate Hoffa there was little hope that deadline could be met.

Views on life after death debated in religious series

By Victoria Groves
Collegian Staff

The last discussion in a five part series of inter–religious dialogues took place last night at the University of Massachusetts regarding views on life after death.

Members from three different religions participated in the discussion, all of whom believe in some sort of life beyond death.

"Is there life after death? It's really not a question. The answer is yes. If there wasn't, there would be no meaning to this life. There would be no justice," said Mohammed Ali Hazratji, representative of the Islamic Society of Western Massachusetts.

Panelist Carol Rutstein, member of the Baha'I Faith Community, also attested to the existence of life after death, but believes it to be a non–physical place.

"Since the soul is non–physical, the next life is a non– physical place. It does not have time or space. But we do know that there are rewards and punishments for this life," Rutstein said.

Representing the Christian religion, Joan Hansen, a forensic psychologist and member of the Wesley United Methodist Church spoke about the Christian view on the afterlife.

"Christianity doesn't define the afterlife and that mystery is some of the fascination," Hansen said.

Hazratji acknowledged the fact that no one is sure what lies beyond this life, but read passages from the Koran to support his views.

"Logically, how can we be sure [of life after death]? The dead folks have not come back to tell us. Science is not going to help us, it doesn't tell us what will happen in the future. But God has revealed it in the last testament," Hazratji said.

"People who did not get justice here will get justice there, because He is the final judge."

"Every religion seems to focus on a life after death. We don't know what it is, we can only hope and wish. Life after death, whatever that may be, makes sense," Hansen said.

The Baha'i faith believes that religion is one vast historical process and that the purpose of this life is to become acquainted

Classism issues discussed in class panel discussion

By Erin M. Baumgartner
Collegian Correspondent

Fluorescent pink and yellow stickers posing the question, "One percent of the U.S. owns 40 percent of the wealth... what's your share?" were plastered along walls and posters at the University of Massachusetts, advertising the week– long programs discussions and performances dealing with issues of classism at the University and in the community as a whole.

The most recent of these events was a panel discussion and speakout called,"From our side of the tracks: Voices of working class students, staff and faculty."

The programs consisted of a small "panel" of mostly students who were willing to share their stories of social class and their encounters, past and present, with classism.

Thomas Coish, head attorney for student legal services, acted the moderator of the discussion. Coish explained the importance of such a panel.

"Issues of being from a working class or poorer class are not well discussed, and many students at this University come from those classes. There is a myth in the United States that we are a classless society which provides equal opportunity for everybody. This is not really entirely true."

Given this introduction, the discussion was opened to students. Most of the discussion revolved around issues of classism at the University.

Freshman Karyn Gorman brought up the dilemma of applying for financial aid at a large university.

"When we had to fill out the FAFSA forms, it was ridiculous," she said. "My mother had to send them back about four times to get a good package, and each time explain that it was just her income that we were living off of. I was also surprised when I saw how many wealthy people there are here. I thought it would be more middle class people. I have become very aware of the division between myself and other people."

Coish sympathized with Gorman's situation.

"It's interesting. If you are truly very poor, then you will get great packages and financial aid but once you cross that line to the middle/lower class you're not going to be given anything," Coish said.

Maria Santoro, a sophomore raised in a "ridiculously hard –working family" discussed economic status in the social perspective.

"I think it's very hard to have wealthy friends here. Last night for example, my friends were all talking

Clinton waits for Iraq's move

By Terence Hunt
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Refusing to trust Saddam Hussein, President Clinton said yesterday he would "wait and see" whether Iraq allows weapons inspectors to resume work. The White House insisted Saddam would not be rewarded for retreating and sent more military force to the Persian Gulf.

"This is not over," declared Sandy Berger, the president's national security adviser.

Three weeks after triggering an international showdown, Saddam suddenly revoked his ban on American weapons inspectors in Iraq. U.N. inspections chief Richard Butler said that if all goes well they would be "back in business on Friday."

Underscoring U.S. skepticism about Iraq, the Pentagon continued its buildup, dispatching F–16 and F–15 fighters, B–1 long–range bombers, refueling planes and soldiers to man Patriot air defense missiles.

area — will have to be removed," O'Connor said, "[the compromise] will lead to the defeat of the original article itself."

Harry Brooks, of precinct six, supported the original Kitchell plan because of the way it turned Boltwood Walk into a pleasant area, but opposed the compromise proposal.

"Another story is exactly what I never wanted," Brooks said, "I don't feel we need to duplicate Northampton."

Roger Wallace said that there is little possibility of a parking deck being built.

"If anyone in 13 years of Town Meeting thinks it'll be easy to add a parking deck, they're crazy," Wallace said. "People from the Town Meeting are crazy — in a positive sense — and would never get a deck a two-thirds vote."

Hwei-Ling Greenuy, whose district includes McLellan Street and the Southwest Dorms, said she voted against the compromise because it did not fit her vision of Amherst.

"By attracting more cars, the center becomes more congested," Greenuy said, "more congestion will deter pedestrians from coming into town."

In regards to downtown businesses, most of which supported the larger Meyer plan because it would bring more customers to the area, Greenuy is not concerned.

Amherst has a student base of over 25,000 at both UMass and Amherst College within walking distance of downtown, giving business a broad base of pedestrian shoppers, Greenuy said.

"I say to businesses wanting more business, go to Northampton where there is a garage," Greenuy said.

Meyer supporters

Some former supporters of the Meyer plan were also a little disgruntled at the resulting compromise.

[Nick] Seamon, owner of the Black Sheep Deli, said that the compromise garage was not big enough, and criticized the town for not taking a proactive approach to it's problems.

"They want to preserve the town the way it was," Seamon said. "But in doing nothing it still changes — there are no longer diverse shops, and the theater is almost gone."

Ira Bryck said that if the town doesn't go forward, it goes backward.

The Northampton garage was built to accommodate double the city's estimated parking need, where as the Amherst garage is planned to accommodate only half of downtown Amherst parking need, Bryck said.

Bryck said that he'd been locked out of the Northampton garage because it was full to capacity on numerous occasions, and that people couldn't find a single person opposed to the Northampton garage now.

Ziff said that compromise shouldn't make everyone completely happy, and in fact should make no one completely happy.

"The time comes when we should say 'it's not our paradise, but it's good enough,'" Ziff said.

Downtown problems

Town Meeting representatives of precinct five, the precinct including Boltwood Walk and downtown Amherst, had conflicting views on whether or not their constituents wanted or needed a garage.

"For a year my constituents in the Clark House and Ann Whalen Apartments have been saying 'don't put in a garage, it's my front yard,'" Lisa Feldman said.

Feldman said that she supported the original Kitchell plan because it would be finished quickly, in six months; but the compromise creates a perpetual uncertainty for the areas elderly and disabled residents about future inconveniences.

The compromise plan would involve these residents in a potentially exhausting, hard and lengthy fight, Feldman said.

The parking garage would increase noise, pollution and congestion in town, Raleigh Turner said.

Pat Church voted against the compromise because her constituents had not given her the O.K. to vote for a garage with unlimited possibilities.

"I was going to vote on Kitchell's [original] plan," said Church, "but I don't believe in this compromise."

Many Town Meeting members supported the original Kitchell plan because they thought it was not "really a garage." A supposition which under the compromise is falsely held Turner said.

"I want to tell you it's really a garage," Turner said, "it can and will be built up. there's always going to be a need for parking."

Logistics and financing

Some town meeting representatives questioned the financing of the compromise plan.

Ruth Hook, of precinct two, voted against the compromise because she felt there were too many financial questions left unanswered.

"It'll cost more than $4 million to reinforce the foundation," Brooks said.

Turner said that the town would have the $4 million in state funds the town is using for the garage until the year 2001.

"We have time to think before we leap," Turner said.

Acquisition by the town of land owned by the Amherst Redevelopment Authority (ARA), essential to construction of a garage at Boltwood Walk, would be $100,000 cheaper with the acceptance of the compromise plan, ARA member Larry Kelly said.

The ARA may give the land over to the town for construction of the compromise garage plan, which they would not have done had the original Kitchell plan passed.

Previously the ARA had taken the position that they might have given the land over to the town in charge if the Meyer plan was accepted.

In regards to the sort notice given on the compromise, Finance Committee acting chair Brian Morton said it would have been nice for the committee to have made a thoughtful opinion on it.

Yet he said that he was not uncomfortable with it.

Select Board member Hill Boss said he also found out about the compromise proposal at the last minute, and said that in all levels of government there is nothing unusual about last minute compromises.

A building committee will now be formed by the town to ensure that all design and construction aspects of the next phase of garage development meet town approval and specifications.

The committee will consist of three members who supported the Meyer plan, three who supported the Kitchell plan, and three more judged by these six to be "garage neutral."
